HOW AN EMPTY BARREL SERVED A USEFUL PURPOSE.

The Story of an Avaricious Uncle, Seven ty-five Thousand in Gold and a Small Boy Who Got the Best of a Daring

[Copyright, 1822, by Charles B. Lewis.] My Uncle Ben was a singular man-so singular that in this day and age everysingular that in this day and age every-body would have called him a crank of the first grade. In the first place, he never married; in the next, he built himself a house which went by the name of "the jail;" again, he sold a lot of land for $75,000 and kept every dollar of the money in the house for years; lastly, I was the only relative or other person he would admit to the house or trust with a dollar.

I went to live with Uncle Ben when I was fifteen years old. He was then a man of sixty and not over well. I don't know how he and father fixed it up, but I went to "the jail" as a sort of assistant to the old man. I don't know but I was also a companion, though there were days at a time when he did not speak to me. He lived in the oil district of Pennsylvania, and the land he sold went to men in the oil business. Mostly with his own hands Uncle Ben built the solid stone house in which he kept the big treasure. It was a one story house, with walls over two feet thick. There were iron bars and iron shutters to the three or four windows, an iron door front and back, and the roof was of boiler plate. There was only one room in the ouse. This was parlor, bedroom, dining room and kitchen combined. The furniture was of the plainest, as were also our meals. There was a back yard about a hundred feet square, and this was surrounded by a board fence sixteen feet high. There was also an iron door in the fence.

The house was two miles from a store, and one reason Uncle Ben wanted me was to run back and forth. He had detemined never to leave the house by itself. though no gang of burglars could have effected an entrance by working all day. The money was all in gold, and kept in a new oil barrel in a corner of the room During my first six months the old man was never away. During the next six he made two trips to the store. If one of us went into the back yard, the iron door was shut and fastened, and it was not opened again, except we gave a certain signal, We were worse off than convicts. Only one window was opened at a time, and we simply sat there and killed time as best we might. We had no books or papers, no games, only now and then a conversation. Uncle Ben expected to be attacked every hour, but no one could prevail upon him to put his money in the bank.

One day, when I had been at "the jail" over a year, some one shoved a letter under the doer. It was for Uncle Ben. It purported to be from a man who wanted to buy a piece of land, and who offered such a big price for it that uncle decided to go to the town, six miles away, and deal with him. The would be buyer fixed an interto the town, six miles away, and deal with him. The would be buyer fixed an interview for 6 o'clock in the evening. It was now November, and it would be dark at that hour. Uncle Ben didn't like the idea of returning on foot after that hour, as it was a rough and unsettled country, but he finally decided to risk it. He left "the jail" at half past 4, but not until he had cautioned me over and over again. I was not to open door or window except at his ignal, which was five raps repeated three times. The only weapons we had were two clubs which he had cut in the forest. He was too stingy to buy firearms.

As soon as the old man had gone I upset the barrel of gold on the floor and sat down to count it. He had several times allowed me to count out $5,000, but always ended up by declaring that the rubbing of the coins was causing him too great a loss. I can tell you that the sum of $75,000 in yel-low gold pieces—five, tens and twenties—is a sight to interest people a great deal o'der than I was, and it wasn't five minutes be fore I had forgotten all else. I thin!: I had counted out eleven piles of $1,000 each when I heard Uncle Ben's signal. We had no clock, but it seemed to me that he had not had time to go and return. I made all haste to scoop the gold into the barrel, but before this was accomplished the signal had been repeated several times. Knowing how annoyed uncle would be, I took down the bar and shot back the bolts as rapidly as possible. As the door opened a strange man walked in, and his first move was to turn around and make things secure. I had retreated to the other end of the room, and all the light we had was a single candle. The man was so cool and quiet that I was surprised instead of being frightened. When he turned to me, how ever, my heart jumped into my mouth. He was a tall, solid fellow, with a dark skin and coal black eyes and hair. I knew little of men at that time, but instinct warned me that this man was a villain. He looked all around the room, as if taking in even the most trilling objects, and by and by he advanced to within three feet of me and said: "Boy, set out everything good to eat you've got in the house!"

We had some cold pork, part of a plate of beans and some indian bread, and I hus tled the stuff onto the table.

"No coffee or tea?" he gruffly demanded. "Don't you lie to me, you young wolf! The old man always keeps whisky. Bring Uncle Ben was not a drinking man, but always kept a little whisky as a medicine. There was about a pint in the jug, and the man poured it out into a basin and drank most of it before he ate a mouthful. Then he fell to and cleared off the table. When the last crumb had been eaten he pulled out a pipe and filled and lighted it and said to me: "If you lie to me I'll skin you alive! Where does the old man keep his money? I pointed to the barrel, and he walked over to it and uttered a shout of surprise and delight. To make things plain to you, I want to relate what had happened to my uncle. Four men, three of whom were strangers to that locality, had formed a plot to rob him. They had taken possession of an old shanty in the woods a mile away, and one of them had written the letter as a decoy. As he came along on his Established 1865.

Asheville, N. C. way to town he was seized and taken to the shanty. By threats of torture they made him reveal the signal. One was left to guard him, while one came on to the house, and the other two started off to get a horse and wagon which they had in the town. They knew the money was in gold and they were to carry it off in the wagon. The robber who had come to the house was in no hurry, as he could do nothing without the others. He upset the barrel just as I had done, and then sat down and gloated over the heap of coin. It was a sight calculated to make him good na-tured, and pretty soon a smile covered his tured, and precty soon a smile covered his face and his tones softened up as he said:

"That's a grand sight, boy—a grand sight Just think of what that heap of gold will buy! I'll never have to work another day as long as I live!"
"But it belongs to Uncle Ben, sir!" I protested having now but little fear of the tested, having now but little fear of the

"He'll never see a piece of it again!" h chuckled. "He may count himself lucky to get off with his life. What an old fool he is to keep a fortune in his house! I expect I'd have been forced to kill him if he nad been home." "If he had been home you wouldn't have got in," I replied. got in," I replied.

"Maybe not. Pretty cute old chap, they say. Bring me the rest of that whisky."

I handed it to him and he drank it all. It was good liquor, and the quantity and quality had the effect to soften him up. Few boys of my age are heroic. I was very ruch frightened at first hat, as he can much frightened at first, but as he grew CATCHING A ROBBER. good natured 1 gradually recovered my nerve, and by and by I found myself won dering bow I could save Uncle Ben's money I had forgotten to tell you that the man had a knife and a revolver. When he sat down to the table he placed both on the board, calculating that the sight would have its due effect. When he arose he put both away again, having a scabbard for the knife and a holster for the pistol. He had no cause to worry about me, knowing that he could break my bones in his grip. I won dered greatly how he could take matters so coolly, having no suspicion of what had hap pened to the old man, and I can truthfully say that I began to make plans. As the liquor affected his brain he grew jolly and began to sing. I could now have made m escape by way of the back door had I so wished, but I was thinking beyond that > was jolly tight. Then he began to sober up and resume his former demeat :. He ordered me to pull the straw ticks off the beds and empty them, and then to divide the gold into two portions and the enc. portion in a tick. He sat look by at no while I worked. When the but were made up to his satisfaction he ordered me to drag them to the front cloor. Drag is the proper word, as it was all I could do to move one along the floor. As I was returning for the second portion the man rose up and looked into the barrel and shook it. A single coin had been left if there, and as it rattled about he bent over to feel for it. As I told you before, it was a new barrel, stout and thick. I no soone caught sight of him with head and shoul ders and both arms in the barrel, and is left foot off the floor, than my line of action came to me with the swiftness of lightning I sprang forward and seized his right lea and exerted all my strength, and it was sufficient to land him in the barrel. His head went to the bottom, while his feet stuck up in the air, and no robber was ever in a worse box. His struggles would have upset the barrel had I not been there to upset the barrel had I not been there to prevent. He kicked furiously, but his feet had only a limited play and I had no trou-ble in avoiding them. I own that I was badly rattled, knowing that he would murder me if he got loose, but still I had no thoughts of giving up. In our struggles we moved the barrel all over the room, but I managed to keep it on end all the time What I feared for the first five minutes was that the robber would get hold of his pistol and fire at my legs through the bar-rel, but as we struggled around I saw that the weapon was jammed fast against the side of the barrel with the butt toward me. It couldn't have been over ten minutes be-fore the man became perfectly quiet, overcome by the rush of blood to his head. I slewed the barrel against the foot of uncle's bedstead, got down the clothesline from its peg and five minutes later 1 had man and barrel and bedstead so firmly lashed together that I no longer feit any fear. The work had only been accomplished when I heard Uncle Ben's signal at the door. I had learned eaution, as you may suppose, and I called to know who was there. As no answer was made I refused to open. The signal was repeated again and again, and when I kept silence the parties finally $b \sim$ trayed themselves. They were the two men with the horse and wagon.

If he got in, how happens the door to be locked?" "Dunno, but there's something wron omewhere. Let's bust the cussed thing off its hinges." The two flung themselves against the door with full force, but it was too strong log to use as a battering ram, but could find nothing in the darkness. Finally, puzzled what to make of the situation they called out to me:

"Boy! boy! Open the door. If you do, we promise not to hurt you. If we have to blow it down with a torpedo, we'll kill

I felt that silence was my strongest weapon, and so it proved. After awhile they became alarmed and made off and I heard nothing more from them. All this time I had kept an eye on the man in the barrel, but he had not moved or cried out. It was about midnight when the two men They went back to the shanty, held a whispered consultation with the sentry and after a few minutes the trio rode off toward town. Uncle Ben was bound and gagged, and as soon as he was alone he be-gan the work of freeing himself. This i accomplished after awhile, and believing that he had been robbed he also made for town to report his loss. Three officers started for home with him, and it was day light when they arrived. When the last-ings were cast off and my prisoner was pulled out of the barrel he was dead and stiff. He probably died within the first half hour. In the fingers of his right hand was clutched a ten dollar gold piece—the coin which had lured him to his death. No one could identify the man, nor was either of the others ever arrested. Everybody called me a brave, cool headed lad, and plenty of people came to look at me and pat me on the back, but I didn't deserve a word of praise. I simply acted on impulse, and I was scared half to death most of the time.

CLENN SPRINCS MINERAL WATER.

After visiting various watering places I came to Glenn Springs almost in despair, suf-cring intensely with Chronic Dyspepsia, in fact some physicians pronounced my case gastritis. Whatever it may have been I am now almost entirely relieved, and that relief has been brought on by the use of Glenn Springs Water. I think it equal if not superior to
