A FIGHT TO THE DEATH.

The Thrilling Incident in the Career of Adm. Blake. After serving his country for many years, both on land and sea, it was not until he was over fifty-six years of age that Adm. Blake was given the command of a fleet at sea. The expedition of which he was in charge was sent to operate against the Spanish. It was at Malaga, where Blake destroyed the combined fleets of Spain and Portugal. On his return to England he was honored with the title of warden of the Cinque ports. It was but a short time after his success in annihilating the hostilities commenced between England and Holland, which had been measurably brought on by dislike to the Dutch, as well as a wish to humiliate them and destroy a rival upon the sea. It was Blake of all others of the naval heroes who was selected and invested with the command of the forces against Holland. Hostilities soon commenced, and Blake found himself opposed by the most celebrated admiral of the age, Van Tromp, at the head of one of the finest equipments that had ever been sent out by the first naval power of the world. Van Tromp appeared in the English channel with forty sail of men-of-war, and by way of defense anchored in Dover roads. The fleet under Blake's command consisted of only twenty-eight when he left Gravesend. Nevertheless, Blake advanced at once. Van Tromp weighed anchor at his advance, both fleets at once began firing, then ranged themselves in order of battle. A desperate fight ensued, which continued from 4 o'clock in the afternoon till night, and the result of which was that the Dutch, after losing several ships, thought proper to retreat. The next affair with the Dutch in which Blake was engaged took place in November following. Van Tromp having largely increased his force, having seventy men-of-war, and sixty-five ships, was seeking to find Blake near the Downs, and he did. Blake's force then scarcely exceeded half that of his opponent, but, not willing to retreat, he determined to try once more what the superiority of his sailors could do under so unequal a strife. The consequence was that after a conflict from eight in the morning till night, Blake found himself compelled to seek refuge by sailing up the Thames. The loss of life in this terrific encounter was immense. Although the circumstances were such as to remove from it all disgrace, Blake felt the discomfort of retreat most severely, especially as it was followed by the Dutch admiral, who immediately made his way around the English coast, bearing a broom fastened to his mainmast, to signify that he had swept the sea of British ships. When Blake sailed from Gravesend on this, his last expedition, he had a fleet of fifty men-of-war, well equipped and manned. Very soon he found his old adversary, with seventy men-of-war and three hundred sail of merchantmen under convoy. The battle this time was far more obstinate than any that had yet been fought between England and any other power. It was a fight to the death of one or the other as a naval predominance of the sea. For three days and nights the two fleets "hung together in embrace," sailing up the channel side by side, never for a moment intermitting their fire; boarding whenever an opportunity could be given, "hand to hand and man to man," when, at last, on the fourth day at daylight the Dutch, having lost eleven of their men-of-war and nearly all of their merchant ships, and finding that only one of the English was destroyed, gave up the fight and took flight for the coast of Holland. This disastrous engagement with Blake did not deter Van Tromp from trying issues with him again, as he sailed forth, but with less force, to contest superiority. Several other engagements took place between the two admirals in the course of a year, and the result, upon the whole, was decidedly in favor of Blake. Having thus asserted the domain of England over the seas, Blake returned to receive the honors bestowed upon him. Blake was given a seat in parliament, but was not long allowed to remain in this in an idle honor. Again he was dispatched with a fleet to the Mediterranean to chastise Spain for certain insults which that power had offered to the English flag. In this expedition he acted with his usual ability. He often engaged in an enterprise against "Gibraltar with great success. While on

"There are bicyclers who are between 60 and 70 years of age, and I can tell you of some who are over 80. One of the best bicyclers in town has got beyond his 65th birthday and he is bald as a drum, too, but can beat most machines of 20 or 30. Glass does not often meet with the delicate attention that it deserves, and this notwithstanding that really brilliantly finished glass makes a most striking show upon any table. Warm, but not hot, water should be used for glass. A wooden bowl is safer than a china one, and should be kept scrupulously clean with rinsings of soda and hot water. Every cloth wherewith to rub the glass must be as soft as soft can be—and as dry. Unless the polishing cloth be really dry the glass does not take any brilliancy, rub as you may. Ammonia, rock salt and tea leaves put into a decanter with some warm water, and vigorously shaken up and down, are effective in dispelling the offending stains. If the shaking does not prove sufficient the decanters or bottles should be left to stand all night, filled with water and ammonia. Long, narrow champagne glasses, flower (especially specimen) glasses require more frequent ablutions than the open form of frequent glasses. Gas globes require an especially drastic treatment, and are only cured—sometimes—of an obstinate dimness by being placed in a saucpan near, not on the fire, with a liberal supply of patent soap powder or soda thrown into the hot water. Two frogs fell into a cream pitcher. After a few unsuccessful attempts to jump out, one of them gave up. "It's no use," he said. "We may as well die and be done with it." "Not so," answered the other. "You may do as you like. I shall keep jumping as long as there is any life in me. Who knows but something will turn up?" This speech put new heart into frog Number One, and both began to try harder than ever to reach the top of the pitcher. The natural result followed.
