THE FALL OF TRO

The Itala Company Produces Homer's Glorious Story.

At Riverside Park tonight and tomorrow night will be shown motion pictures depicting the Fall of Troy. This is a theme of never failing interest and the following story of the play will prove of interest.

Helen of Troy, as she is called, was the wife of the Greek king, Menelaus, Her father was Jove, the King of Gods, and her mother was a mortal woman. She was the most beautiful woman the world had ever seen. She was so beautoful that all the Greeks looked upon her as a national treasure. So, wifen Paris, the son of Priamus, king of Troy, abducted her from her husband's home, all the Greeks joined Menelaus in an expedition, with a thousand ships, to attack Troy, the home of the abductor, For ten years the Greeks stormed the walls of this great city without success. In the end, by means of a stratagem. a big wooden horse in which a dozen of the bravest Greeks were on fire and se destroyed it.

It was indeed, an adventurous unthe scenes of this great story told by Homer, a poet of Greece, who was Shakespeare's equal. Yet, no expense was spared in making these pictures and as one beautiful scene after another is thrown on the screen. me not set scenes, built up in a theater, but what appear to be the very palaces of Greece, with columned halls

Ménelaus, the king, takes leave of his wife in the beautiful garden back of his palace, and, mounting his twowheeler charlot, drives away to pay a lish. We see him, in the next scene driving through the beech-tree bordered lanes of Sparts. Then comes Paris as an ambanador and Helen, the mistress of the frouse in the absence of her husband, receives him in the great marble hall. It is lined with fluted Deric columns and thronged with attendants, her own house servants and those who have followed Paris bearing rich gifts.

Paris is smitten by a shaft of love at first sight of beautiful Helen. In the garden she repulses him: but later, as the two stand together on the hawn beside the palace, a lonely place bathed in silver moonlight, Venus, the Goddens of Love, appears. favors Paris. Was it possible for a mortal woman, though she were wholly lovely to hold out against the power of a goddess? Helen falls into Paris' arms and Venus throws her well over them. She disappears, We catch a glimpse of them as they are wafted away to Trey in Venus magic sea shell chariet, accompanied by all the flying Loves. Menelaus won't believe the news at We see him thunderstruck by it, as he sits feasting in another beautiful room. Home again, we see him gathering together the heroes of Greece, who swear to revenge him,

By this time Paris has reached Troy with the fair Belen, and we have a picture of a luxurious feast in a gorgeous palace of the Phrygian city. Paris brings Helen a golden cup of vine and they drink from it by turns. Then the Greek ships appear outside the harbor, a far slimpse of which can be seen from the palace. Helen looks out and sees her fermer friends and seems much disturbed.

Now follow some of the most remarkable scenes ever produced. One is an attack on the walls of a great city by an innumerable army. movable tower is wheeled slowly up against the battlements and scaling ladders are brought, but great stones are hurled against the tower and and down on the thick crowds of the besiegers. The Greeks loose too many men and have to retreat. Now they resort to strategy.

The next picture is magnificent. We see the great wooden horse on a hillside and Troy in the distance. The Greeks retreat and the rejoicing Trojans break a passage in the wall of their city and draw in the horse. They suppose it an offering to the gods. A Grecian spy takes the news to the hiding fleet. Night comes. The hiding heroes come from the horse and set the city in flames. The rest of the Greek army appears. Now, as the flames spread through the city. we catch glimpses of turmoil and confusion. Parties of inhabitants fleeing in terror, caught by Greeks and turning at bay only to be cut down.

Paris and Helen are asleep. They awake and throw open the casement. Troy, the glorious, is now a nest of flames. They rush into the palace. In its great columned, hall they meet Menciaus and the Greeks. Menciaus kills Paris and has Helen led away. Now, looking back, we see a sad vision of a ruined city and its smeuldering, red-hot walls. red-hot walls,
