BUT LAUREL REMAINS

GORGEOUS RHODODENDRON NOT YET HERE.

Azaleas Are Fairy Torches and Then Scarlet Colors Flame in Hidden Recesses of Spring Woods.

(By the Observer.) While the amicas are almost gone, here and there in the woods may still discovered a flaming torch of wonderful beauty. That the woods may lose none of their springtime glory, however, the mountain laurel is now in full bloom, the pink and the white blossoms being found everywhere within short distances from those strange places, men call cities. The rhododendron is not yet out, although it is making earnest promises that it will soon appear, and the heavy bushes are fairly filled with the buds. Na-ture is kind to western North Carolina people in many ways. In no particu-lar, however, is she more considerate than in the order of that floral pro-cession passing through the deep woods surrounding Asheville.

It is a rare delight these days to ride some little frequented mountain trial with nothing in particular to do and with ample time in which to do it. The trail may lead along some mountain side, with the regetation in places so dense overhead that the places so dense overhead that the sun's rays are quite obscured and the green woods look to be full of mys-tery and romance and fairy spirits. While expecting to see one of these fairies jump out at you, you see s streak of flame in the forest and be-ing very brave you soon discover it to be a late anales. The bush is robbed of its glory and later some hitherto dark corner in the living room is transformed into an altar where sheet beauty is worshipped.

Nearly All Gone.

But the azaleas are almost all gone, although they will soon return, for next spring is but a short time away. The mountain laurel is jealous of the wonderful charm of the steer flower. wonderful charm of its sister flower and so is trying very hard to take its place. But the laurel, sometimes confused by ignorant city folks with rhododendron, is a more modest flower and strive as it may the woods are not the same with the azalea's fairy torch missing. Soon, however, will come the true rhododendron—most magnificent of all the mountain flowmagnificent of all the mountain flowers and which literally and truly changes the woods and the sides of the hills into abiding places of love and longing and of day dreams where dreams come true. The bower is splendid in all its many colorings and there is a legend that somewhere, some place, in Polk county there is actually a blue rhododendron. This may seem too startling to be the truth, nevertheless it is seriously stated. Surely a blue rhododendron would be worth a long, long journey to find. There are many other flowers in the Bire, thought to have been caused by an electric iron left standing on a board with the current turned on, caused some slight damage early this morning at the home of Louis H. Polick, 218 Broadway.

An alarm was turned in at about 1 o'clock but when the firemen reached the house the blaze had been practically extinguished. There are many other flowers in the woods, as well, and all of them the more beautiful for that they are wild and uncultivated. The colors are WASHINGTON, June 1.—So that southern members may be free Monday to welcome the Confederate veterans for their reunion here and to permit the entire membership to observe registration day Tuesday, the house today agreed to adjourn tomorrow until Wednesday. many and varied, varying in fact from pink to yellow. In some spots the floor of the woods is capeted with the flowers, fantastically woven into a pathowers, rantastically woven into a pat-tern worthy of being copied by man. Along the edges of the trail, often at places where the horse manifests a desire to stop and nibble of the long grass, may be found wild strawber-ries, as incomparably sweeter to the taste as the wild flowers are more taste as the wild flowers are more charming to the eye than those spending their lives in city hot houses. The wild strawberries are naturally shy, and hide close under their protecting leaves. Also are they smaller than their city cousins, but to find a handful and to eat them slowly and with due thoughtfulness as you amble along one of the little frequented trails, now and then catching a slimpse of a faming azalea in the woods, is something really worth while these spring days.

"One day," began Grandma, "when I was a little girl, my mother and I were out in the yard. It was in the spring and mother had gone to look at some of her flowers. was a man and the biggest black bear I ever saw or have ever seen since.

The bear was standing on his hind legs and he was almost twice the size of the man. The bear had a leather muzzle on his mouth and nose and fastened to that was a heavy chain which the man held wound around his hand. The man said something to the bear and began to sing. As soon as the bear heard the singing he began to dance round and round in a funny sort of a way but keeping pretty good time to the music. Round and round he went hopping and jumping until he was out of breath, then he stopped and looked at his master.

"Just then my father came out of the barn and, seeing the bear, came out into the yard toward them. When the man saw father he asked him if he wouldn't let him sleep in the barn, that he had walked a long way and they were both very tired."

"If you will" the man said, "to-mogrow when the bear is rested, I will make him do tricks and climb that big tree."

Father thought a minute and then told him that he could stay in the barn but, he said "be sure you fasten the bear so he can't get away."

The man promised and he walked away with the bear lumbering along beside him. When we had had our dinner, father took some out to the man and some catmeal for the bear. The man was very grateful and ate his supper while we watched the bear cat his oatmeal and then lie down on some hay and go to sleep.

The next morning, true to his promise, the man made the bear go through his tricks of rolling over, standing on his hind legs and walking and at last he went toward the tree and told the bear to climb which he did almost to the top.

After a good dinner they left and the last we saw of them they were walking toward the village but I never forget the bear's visit.
