How "Near-Traitors" in America Give Aid and Comfort to Germany

Mr. Root came back from Russia and told us there were men walking our city streets "who ought to be taken out at sunrise and shot for treason," and the "unhinged traitors" of Colonel Roosevelt's phrase have been roundly denounced in public speech and in the newspapers.

The Boston News Bureau finds the aroused attention of the country focused "upon the extent to which handicap is imposed upon war-effort by various species of treason or near-treason." While everyone, according to the New York Evening Sun, "is asking why the Kaiser is being allowed to make war upon the United States openly upon American soil."

The Springfield Republican agrees that we have reached a stage when opposition to the war is bolder and more aggressive than it has been at any time in the previous five months, and the insolence of this opposition is often "infuriating to patriotic citizens." But it cautions calmness and contends that "nothing is to be gained by threatening to have somebody shot at sunrise for treason."

How To Get the Pith of All the News of All the World

If you wanted to learn the views of the country at large on a given question, say woman suffrage, how would you go about it? The most thorough way, of course, would be to obtain an expression of opinion from every individual and to compare and classify these—an impossible task. The next best thing would be to read and digest what the press as a whole has to say on the subject. But where would you find the time? At this point we offer you a suggestion, or rather, to be precise, a solution. THE LITERARY DIGEST does all this work for you, impartially and accurately, and lays the result before you. The gathering of such information upon all subjects of general interest and human appeal has been perfected into a science by this greatest of all news-magazines. It gives you the concentrated meat of facts, collected from all sources, rejecting all extraneous matter. If you want this, and who does not, read THE DIGEST.
