GROW YOUNG PINES IN HOME GARDEN

With more and more land being taken out of production by cotton, wheat and tobacco growers in North Carolina and the release of poor or marginal land to be planted to pasture or forest crops, there will arise a need for seedling trees to plant on this marginal land.

"Pine seedlings to be planted on marginal land may be secured from both State and commercial nurseries, but often the cost of only $3 a thousand for such seedlings prevents a person from securing them to planting on his home farm," says R. W. Graeber, extension forester at State College. "For that reason a live-at-home plan may be followed by growing the seedlings in the home garden. A pine seedbed may be prepared at little cost and such a bed four feet wide by ten feet long will produce enough seedlings to plant three or four acres of land."

Mr. Graeber believes that a project like this will be of interest to the boys on the farm.

To get the seed, the pine cones must be picked in the fall before they flare open and when the kernels in the cone are full, white and firm but not milky. Cones collected from trees which have been cut in logging operations will save the hard work of climbing the trees. When the cones have been secured, they may be spread on floor or in the sun to dry thoroughly and then beaten or raked to release the seed.

When the seed are well dried, they should be placed in a tight container in a dry, cool place. With the possible exception of White pine, Graeber says the pine seed should be planted in the seed bed in the spring. They need to be lightly covered with soil. There is less wilting or damping off when sand is used for covering. This also makes it easier to keep the bed free from weeds. The bed should be kept moist but not water-soaked.

The bed should be covered with brush or light lath frame, Graeber suggests
