NEED FELT IN STATE FOR WORK ANIMALS

North Carolina farmers must replace about 22,000 horses and mules each year. So far these replacements are being shipped into the State and it each animal costs only $150 a head, Tarheel farmers must spend a grand of $3,300,000 to replace their failing work animals.

"Few horses or mules are seen in cities and towns but out in the country, this form of power is still used almost exclusively by landowners," declares Prof. Fred M. Haig of the animal husbandry department at State College. "At present, we have 75,000 horses and 295,000 mules in the State. The average life of these animals is about 15 years which makes it necessary for Tarheel farmers to replace about 22,000 animals each year. As most of these animals are purchased from without the borders of the State, this constitutes a heavy drain upon the farm income."

Therefore, Prof. Haig advises that at least enough colts be grown at home for replacement purposes. This can be made practically a noncash cost, he says, because feed grown at home on adjusted acres might be used to grow the colts at little cost. The colts could be broken to harness when coming three years of age and if wisely handled will make excellent work animals.

Three things are essential for success in raising colts at home, Haig says. First select good mares and high class stallions or jacks. Take good care of the mare and feed her properly while she carries the colt. Then, while the foal is growing, handle him with gentleness and see that he is properly fed.

NOTICE OF SALE OF LAND

McCall on October 1, 1923, on the tract of land hereinafter described, to secure the payment of a note under seal made and executed by the said C. A. McCall to The Champion Fibre Company bearing even date with said deed in trust for the sum of One Hundred

From Gullies To Forest In 12 Years

The washing away of the Tennessee Valley's topsoil wealth, in some instances almost unchecked for generations, is now being combated by landowners of the region, in cooperation with their county agents and the Tennessee Valley Authority, in both fields and forests by the most efficient and economical methods yet employed by government experts.

Warfare on soil erosion takes two forms: readjustment of farming practices, and the use of practical forestry methods. The necessity for checking erosion is, similarly, two-fold. From the farmer's standpoint, erosion represents a considerable annual loss of the fertility of the soil from which he draws his living. Engineers are concerned with the problem of erosion because deposits of silt reduce the usefulness of reservoirs created by such structures as Wilson dam at Muscle Shoals, Joe Wheeler dam 1 1/2 miles above it, and the Norris dam near Knoxville—the latter two now under construction by the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Engineers estimate that storage capacity of the Wilson dam has been reduced 30 per cent in the last decade. A similar amount in storage reservoirs would be wiped out in the course of years, whereas, the dams themselves are constructed to stand for many centuries.

New Methods Used

The methods of combatting erosion perhaps most familiar to farmers are the building of terraces on sloping lands and the piling of brushwood in gullies. Nowadays, farmers of the Tennessee Valley are making additional use of vines, bushes and saplings by practicing forestry methods of erosion.

The accompanying "before-and-after" photographs, taken in West Tennessee, prove what can be done by such methods. Picture No. 1 shows a farmer plowing down a badly washed piece of land during the winter season when he has time for such odd jobs as erosion control. Picture No. 2 was taken 12 years later. The same spot now shows, instead of bare silt incapable of producing anything, a fine stand of black locust which will be cut for fence posts in a few years. In addition, yearly layers of fallen leaves and other decaying vegetation are building up a new and fertile topsoil so that future tree growth will be expedited.

Successful Projects Visited

These photographs were exhibited during a recent conference at Jackson, Tennessee, of foresters from Tennessee, Kentucky, Indiana, Ohio, Missouri and Mississippi which was attended by Edward C. M. Richards, chief forester of the Tennessee Valley Authority. The subject of the meeting was the part that practical forestry plays in checking soil erosion. A two-day field trip, including such successful projects as the one pictured, demonstrated conclusively that the latter is a valuable ally of the farmer.

Approximately 100,000 acres of land surrounding the Norris dam reservoir. Already these methods are being practiced by contract with the owners, on 25,000 acres of such lands.

In addition, the Authority is urging farmers of the Norris dam watershed to build terraces, fill in gullies, and plant sod-forming crops—not to prevent the Norris dam pool from filling with silt but to improve and enrich their own lands.
