BUY N. C. CHICKS, SAYS POULTRY MAN

C. F. Parrish, extension poultryman at North Carolina State College, advises North Carolina farmers to purchase North Carolina chicks.
The buying of high grade chicks, free from taints of diseases, is one of the most important factors in starting the season off right, he said. Special care should be exercised to guard against chicks which have been infected with bacillary white diarrhoea.

Purchasers who get their chicks from North Carolina breeders and hatcheries are playing safe, he said. And to make sure that the chicks are not infected with the diarrhoea, they should buy only those from stock that has been blood-tested.

Reports on the livability of 81,806 chicks from State-tested flocks show that 94.2 per cent lived through the first four weeks of brooding.

Mr. Parrish advised poultrymen to consult their county agents or write to him at State College for a list of the hatcheries operating under the supervision of the state department of agriculture and offering chicks from flocks tested by the department.
