Production of Honey

Increased interest is being shown in the honey industry in Transylvania county, and several people are making plans to raise better class worker bees.

C. L. Sams, bee specialist from State College was here Monday and gave demonstrations to an interested group. Proper hiving, re-queening, disease prevention, and proper handling of honey after extraction, were some of the phases of bee culture gone into at the R. F. Tharp farm in West Brevard, where Mr. Tharp and J. W. Dickson have the county's largest apiary. Adding to the occasion was the stinging of bees, lemonade and cake served by Miss Malva Tharp and Miss Margaret Dickson.

Following the demonstrations at the Tharp place, Mr. Sams, accompanied by Assistant County Agent Maness and Agriculture Teacher Lunsford, visited farms of O'Neal Cantrell, James W. Dickson, Jr., F. H. Holden, and C. K. Osborne, each of whom are interested in bee culture.

Handling bees, Mr. Sams explained to the group, is like handling precious gems, one only needs to be careful and there will be no ill after effects. Bees sting, the specialist said, only when they are frightened or injured, and that if one will just "take it easy" when handling bees there is no danger of being stung. Mr. Sams could pick handfuls of the bees out of the hives and never suffered even one sting.

This offer only holds good, the doctor explained, so long as the vaccine which was bought for the pre-school clinics lasts.
