Mr. Bradburn has released the following schedule of fees, which will be paid at the time of registration:

Tracking Station Will Be Dedicated In October

The $13.4 million satellite tracking station above Rosman "is symbolic of a new era in North Carolina," James E. Webb, head of the National Aeronautics and Space Agency, says.

Mr. Webb, a native of Oxford, N. C., joined Gov. Terry Sanford of North Carolina, Sen. B. Everett Jordan, D-N.C., and Rep. Roy A. Taylor, D-N.C. last weekend in commenting on a second big dish tracking station to be begun at Rosman early in October.

Ground will be broken to start that installation at the same time the first one is dedicated, and Mr. Webb said he'll be there for the event.

"It is traditional for North Carolina to be in the forefront of important things," he said at a news conference. "We did it with roads and we did it with schools and now we're doing it with space."

He also congratulated Governor Sanford on the state's plan to spend $2 million for studies at universities to find uses for the state's industrial and natural resources in the space effort.

Gov. Sanford replied:

"North Carolina is extremely anxious to get moving in the space age by using its resources to utilize new discoveries of the space age to build a sounder and more sophisticated economy."

North Carolina, Mr. Webb said, can expect the Rosman tracking station to bring new tourist business to Pisgah National Forest, where the station is located.

Rep. Taylor said,

"This is a step forward in development of the space program and a step forward for the people of North Carolina, who welcome it."

Located in upper Transylvania county, the installation will include two large-dish antennas, each 12 stories high and weighing 300 tons, plus two concrete buildings, one for operations and the other for housing six 250-kilowatt generators.

On Town's Future Expansion

A report on consumer problems and a possible modernization plan for Brevard was given to town merchants and Brevard Planning Board members by Jay Chatterjee, staff member of the Western North Carolina Regional Planning Commission (WNCRPC), at the board's regular meeting Tuesday night in City Hall.

The WNCRPC has been conducting surveys in the county for several weeks, analyzing economic and business trends and working on projections of these trends for the future. Mr. Chatterjee is in charge of central business planning for the Commission.

After an extensive study of the land-use program of Brevard, Mr. Chatterjee concluded that the main problem facing Brevard businessmen and consumers is that of parking, which he described as "very poor".

According to his findings the parking area in town (not including on-the-street, or metered parking) is allocated thusly: space for 422 cars exists, 210 spaces are reserved for employee parking, 134 are un-metered or free parking, and 78 are purely reserved for customer parking.
