Student Phillip Hopkins Has Unusual Hobby

By Dennis Avery

If you ever wish to build, play or just have a general knowledge about a clavichord, visit Phillip Hopkins, third floor Taylor Dormitory, for he has single - handedly built his own clavichord.

Phil, a freshman here at Brevard College, served in the Air Force from 1966 to 1970.

A clavichord is an instrument on the same scale as the harpsichord or piano. Clavichords were popular from 1400 to about 1750. The clavichord and harpsichord are the early predecessors of the modern day piano. The only difference between a clavichord and a piano is that a clavichord has fifty-four keys and a piano has eighty-eight and a broader range of sound.

The clavichord has a soft and delicate tone and is mostly used for personal enjoyment. This is a reason why the clavichord has lost its popularity for it isn't loud enough for a band or orchestra. This is also the reason Phil built one.

A clavichord, off the showroom floor, costs anywhere from $600 to $1400. Phil bought the kit for $200 and in about two months he had his clavichord, which he can play quite adequately even though he is self-taught. It is not often that one finds a person who will work this hard and long, between classes and homework assignments, to build his own instrument, especially if it's a clavichord.
