Brevard Graduates Urged To Restore 'Moral Ecology'

Lt. Gov. H. Pat Taylor called upon graduating students of Brevard College Sunday to join with their elders to "restore our human and moral ecology" as well as protecting the physical environment.

He challenged the students to join his generation to "restore some of the balance of nature, for unless we do, we may not survive;" and "restore some of the values which are just as essential to life as our physical needs."

"Your generation," he said, "sometimes speaks of love as though you invented it. You didn't. My generation's greed and prejudice have at times made a mockery of the ideal of brotherly love. But I'm not sure you are doing much better."

While it is wrong, the lieutenant governor said to judge young people by the length of their hair, it is equally wrong for them to show hatred or dislike for the student with a crew cut and white socks.

Mr. Taylor told the students that he was going to depart from tradition and not tell them about "going out into the world . . . about the world you're going to be living in . . . as though you have been living somewhere else" to the present.

The older generations and the younger, he said, are not as far apart as might appear. "Perhaps the only major difference between your view of the world and mine is one of perspective. If I see things a little differently than you do, it is probably because I see them in context of a longer period of time and a larger inventory of remembered events."

He referred to the Southeast Asian war having gone on almost as long as they "have been able to read," the civil rights movement is a relatively recent thing to him he said, and while "we had lived most of our lives under an entirely different set of circumstances . . . for you, it has been part of the world around you all your lives."

He said similar comparisons could be made on "a lot of other subjects: economics, ethics, work, sex, conservation, education . . ."

Mr. Taylor then said he "would like to ask what we together, you and I, your generation and mine, can do to make a new 'normality,' which you know so well, something we can live with. Since the good old days will never come again, how can we create some good new days for ourselves and our children?"

He said some values are polluted, as are the rivers; society is clouded with suspicion, prejudice and hate as the air is choked with smog; and "outworn concepts and judgments litter the moral landscape and need to be recycled. As a result of the imbalance of the physical en-environment, the fish and the birds are dying, and in the wreckage of our social and cultural environment, we see the death of such things as hope, courage, charity, integrity and even love."

Finally, he said, "our future together amounts to a challenge and an opportunity as difficult and important and potentially rewarding as any generation has ever faced. If we can handle it, we may indeed change the course of history and insure the survival and improvement of the human race . . ."

"If we can't, there may be no future beyond our own."

Dr. Robert A. Davis, Brevard College president, presented Mr. Taylor, and later awarded 92 associates in arts and 27 junior college diplomas.

Dean Grady H. Whicker announced the awards winners.

Chaplain C. Edward Roy pronounced both the invocation and benediction, and the college glee club and choir sang the anthem from Anton Bruckner's Mass in E Minor.
