PICTURE TAKING TIME requires quick changes for Senior Phil Hall.

A brief look of pain washed over the teacher's face as she watched four of her students rise to leave. It was their turn for pictures.

They strolled down the breezeway and came into the back of the auditorium. Their homeroom was already congregating there, crowding around the warped mirror. They arranged ties and combed hair. Compacts were whipped out and noses were powdered.

Our students fought their way between elbows, risking black eyes and broken noses. A cry of "Where's my mascara?" filled the air. They practiced smiles. (You would be surprised at the many different flavors of "cheese" that stand before the mirror.)

Slowly the pupils lined up for zero-hour. The photographer mopped his brow with a wet bandana and took the first person. The latter sat down on a stool that was a reject from Romper Room. The camera-man measured distance and his position. The victim steadied himself and looked at the camera. "Alright, let's have a big smile," he heard. A frigid smile, and the ordeal was over.

Our student staggered out. Similar tortures continued for the rest of the class. This was the trial of the underclassmen. For seniors it was a completely different story.

Seniors, the cream of the crop, of course, went through the normal, everyday horrors of their first picture, then rose above the crowd to endure the photographer's next bag of tricks. They proceeded to be buttoned into a size three robe. One comment was, "the collar had a mind of its own - the mind said CHOKER." Everything adjusted, they began again. Feeling like children of Dracula, they stumbled into the camera niche. The flash again, then it was over . . . till next year?
