are infested with bagworms. These insects are fairly easy to control.

Evergreen Enemy Bagworms feed mainly on evergreens such as arborvitae, red cedar, juniper, hemlock and pine. They also may attack apple, elm, maple, sycamore, oak, locust or willow trees. Bagworm injury is frequently overlooked early in the season when the bags are small. By the time actual feeding is noted, these pests have developed to a stage where they are very difficult to control with chemicals.

Life Stages - Eggs remain in the bag over winter. These eggs hatch in the spring about the last of May. The young larvae (caterpillars) begin to feed immediately after hatching and build a bag or "cocoon" lined with silk and having leaves and stems of the host plant on the outside. This cocoon gets bigger as the caterpillar develops. It reaches full size about mid-August. The caterpillar takes its protective bag wherever it goes. The larvae change to pupae within the cocoon. The male moths leave the cocoon from late August to early November. They are almost

Leaf Nuisance Can Be Made Something Useful

By M. E. GARDNER N.C. State University

There is a song about "Autumn Leaves" that I like. It is not so bad when they "begin to fall" but when they cover you up, they become a nuisance. Sometimes, though, a nuisance can be converted into something useful and that is what this story is about — compost.

Compost is organic material which has been treated to hasten decomposition. When ready to use, it should be about the consistency of leaf mold such as you would find on the forest floor in the deep woods.

Leaves make good compost because they decompose rather rapidly, when properly handled, and what is more important, they contain no weed seed.

It is best to confine the leaves in a pit of some sort or build a pen with logs, old slabs or boards. The pen may be any convenient size and about five feet high for convenience in filling. An abandoned trench silo would be fine.

Pack leaves in layers about one foot deep. Wetting will facilitate packing. As each layer is packed in, spread one cup of an 8-8-8 fertilizer and one cup of dolomitic limestone on each 10 square feet of surface area. This will give you a starting point from which you can judge about the amount of fertilizer and lime to use without measuring each time.

Keep all layers wet as you build the pile but do not add enough water at any one time to wash out soluble fertilizer materials.

When finished, the center of the heap should be left lower than the sides to absorb rain water.

Keep the pile wet at all times to promote rapid decomposition. This is especially important during dry periods.

One ton of dry leaves will yield about three tons of good rich compost in about six months. Do you know of a cheaper source of organic material? Or one that has so many uses?

LOSSES

Plant diseases on the average cause about a 10 per cent crop loss of annual U.S. production of all crops. Worldwide, the loss is closer to 20 per cent, according to North Carolina State University plant pathologists. These losses become increasingly significant as population threatens to outrace man's ability to produce food.
