Tar Heels Were Active In Spanish-American War

BY PEGGY HOWE

From the use of the Gatling un invented by a North Sarolinian, to trench warfare in Europe, tthe Tar Heel state was actively involved in the Spanish-American War and World War I.

borCall to Arms" a new exhibit opening Wednesday (Feb. 5) at the Museum of History shows aspects of these two wars-both at home and and North overseas-Carolina's participation in each. Weapons, uniforms and insignia, flags and ensigns. equipment of all kinds, photomurals and posters will give visitors a glimpse into wars of several generations ago.

The Spanish-American War, called "the splendid little war," found the United States Army ill-prepared but the Navy in first-rate condition. Americans were uninformed about the wary, and did not understand that the liberation of Cuba, the stated objective, ould involve fighting in the Philippines and Puerto Rico, as well as the annexation of foreign territory.

Each state was responsible for its own volunteer contingent for military duty, and official reaction varied. For example, North Carolina Gov. Daniel L. Russell declared that he would not spend the price of a telegram to support the state's volunteers.

Because of such attitudes, Americans were haphazardly and inadequatley armed, mostly with an obsoltete rifle called the "trapdoor" Springfield. A Raleigh newspaper noted that the 'slow-loading, smokedischarging Springfield did little more than make excellent targets of our troops." In contrast, the modern 7 mm repeater Mauser used by Spanish troops was far superior.

gave her a decided advantage. A uniform worn by Ensign Worth Bagley, the first naval office killed in the Spanish-American war, is on display. He died aboard the "Winslow" during an attack on Spanish batteries at Cardenas, Cuba, May 11, 1898.

Also on display is the carved coat of arms from the "Raleigh," the ship that received the surrender of all defenses at the entrance to Manila Bay. The light cruiser was named for the city of

The Gatling gun, designed by Dr. Richard J. Gatling of Hertford County, the first successful mechanical machine gun, is represented in the exhibit by a shiny brass specimen. During the famous charge up San Juan Hill on July 1, 1898, Gatling guns provided the U.S. Army's first ground attack with machine guns, and were instrumental in securing the American

As in all wars, the Spanish-American veterans returned home with Spanish, Cuban and Philippine souveniers. Businessmen found a lucrative market in war memento reproductions, but many of the originals are brought out for visitors to the new exhibit.

BLACKS

During the Spanish-American War, North Carolina was one of only three states to honor the appeal of the black volunteers for their own officers. The first allblack regiment, the Third, under the command of Major James H. Young of Raleigh served with distinction. One of the uniforms from that regiment and the regimental flag are shown.

A few years later World War I found Amercians more understanding of their country's position. German submarines had continued to sink American ships, and military retaliation was necessary. America "reluctantly, then with increasing enthusiasm, took on the war mantle."

More than 86,000 North Carolinians entered military service, and were represented neavily in several famous divisions, amon them the 30th "Old Hickory" Division, the 81st "Wildcat" Division and the 42nd "Rainbow" Division, where they compiled enviable records.

The black response was considerably heavier in World War I than in the Spanish-American War, and the 371st regiment was composed entirely of blacks from North and South Carolina.

They served both as enlisted men and in the officer ranks, Feb. 23, at Fontana Village were in the Council of Defense Cafeteria at home, and were active in war bond and savings stamp drives, and Red Cross Uniforms of the soldiers in the trenches and of the nurses who ministered unto them are displayed. Machine guns mounted behind sandbag barricades and manned by grimy, mud-spattered doughboys lend authenticity to the exhiibit. At their feet are captured weapons and assorted shells.

the background "no-man's land" and gas wargare is remembered with gas masks and gas alarm ratchets. A "trench periscope" represents some of the combat equipment developed for World War I.

Pigeon cases hang along the walls, in memory of the useful carrier. Some of these birds were decorated for bravery.

At home, civilians raised victory gardens, while others joined the Red Cross and sewed hospital linens and clothing, collected food and surgical supplies and operated canteens for the traveling service men.

And presiding over all are wartime photomural displays and propaganda posters. These feature scenes from the home front as well as from the battlefield. Also pictured will be several North Carolinians who served prominently in the war effort, including Josephys Daniels, secretary of the Navy; Walter Hines Page, ambassador to England; Angus W. McLean, director of the War Finance Corporation; and Walter Clark, arbitrator of the War Labor Board.

Brochures on the two wars will be available in the area. As the pamphlet states, "unlike the Spanish-American soldier who returned home to indifference and sometimes hostility, the World War I veteran came home a hero. Both the civilian and soldier marched in their numerous victory parades, secure in the belief that they had fought for what was right and had won.'

And the Museum of History exhibit, remembers both wars in the "Call to Arms" exhibit.

The Museum is located in the Archives and History-State Library Building, 109 East Jones St., Raleigh. Museum hours are 8:30 to Monday through Saturday, and 2 to 5 p.m. Sunday . Admission is free.
