Some Hendersonville History

The telephone in the office of the light and power company rings again. A feminine voice this time, that of one of the company's best patrons, one who uses a large amount of lighting service each month. "Is this the dynamo?" In order to save time strict veracity is thrown overboard and the office replies "Yes, this is the dynamo." "What's the matter with the lights? There is not a light on in my house, but everybody else in the neighborhood seems to have light."

It is past seven o'clock of a dark winter evening, and an icy mixture of sleet and rain is covering everything up outside. However, there is no help for it, and the office catches Mr. Bangs at his house, where he thought the day's work was over. He gets into working clothes once more, cranks up the Henry, and makes a drive of nearly a mile through the rain and sleet. When he arrives at the scene of trouble he discovers that someone a servant or a child, has pulled out the main switch and left it open. Mr. Bangs closes the switch and seeks the outer air where he may express himself without restraint, and beats it for home. One more trouble "killed."

THE HOME ELECTRIC COMPANY

Brown and Jones

were neighbors; their wives were friends and their children "chums."

When Brown died, the Company carrying the mortgage on his home foreclosed and Mrs. Brown had to move.

When Jones died, the Company carrying his mortgage promptly gave Mrs. Jones a deed to the property.
