BUICK HOLDS GOOD RECORD

Old Cars Are Placed Into All Kinds of Services.

What becomes of all the automobiles?

This is the question which arises naturally in many minds, in response to the news that the automobile industry is tuning up in anticipation of a record-shattering production in 1928. Obviously, a certain proportion of the three or four million cars built in this country each year go to replace vehicles which have passed out of service as such. It is equally certain that not all of the replaced cars have been junked. But where, then, are they?

This is the question asked of A. B. Batterson, director of advertising for the Buick Motor Company.

Mr. Batterson answered that while he could speak only for Buick, the files of the Buick Bulletin contained hundreds of photographs showing these cars making good in lines outside ordinary highway transaction.

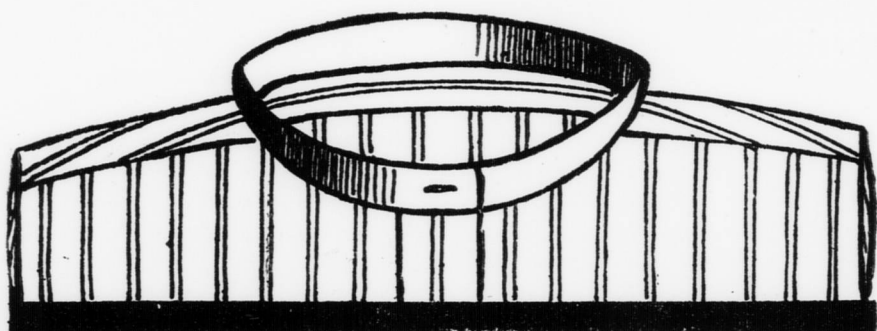

"In the first place, fully three-quarters of all the two million Buicks which have been built are still in service as motor cars," said Mr. Batterson. "Of those which are not, hundreds have been converted into power plants of various sorts. Some are running sawmills, some operate pumping outfits, some are in marine use, and many more find useful employment in various phases of construction."

"We recently issued through our news service a picture of a Buick sedan which the Northern Pacific lines had transformed into a 'locomotive' by substituting steel flanges for the rubber tires. Since then, we find that this is not entirely untrue. C. Baldwin, superintendent of the Columbus Division of the Central of Georgia Railway, has a similar converted Buick which he uses for inspection work. It enables him to keep close supervision over his trackage at a fraction of the cost of the steam equipment formerly used, Mr. Baldwin says.

These are only a few of the unusual jobs which Buick's reputation for power and stamina have suggested to users in various parts of the world. The list is being enlarged constantly, answering at least in part, the question that was asked. Thousands of cars keep on earning their way long after their value as transportation has been extracted, the only limit to such use, apparently, being the ingenuity of their owners.

Call in and let a salesman of the Forest City Motor Co. tell you all about the Buick automobiles.
