Ocracoke Folks Want To Join Carteret County

Dissatisfied With Government Of Hyde County So It Is Reported

MAY PETITION LEGISLATURE

MOREHEAD CITY, Nov. 25—The people of Ocracoke are in political rebellion against the government of Hyde county. The voters of Ocracoke, nearly 100 strong, are prepared to petition the North Carolina legislature that they be "divorced" from Hyde county and "wed" to Carteret. These significant statements are contained in a letter to the Carteret county commission from John H. Andrews, superintendent of the Ocracoke schools.

Supt. Andrews states that seven-eighths of the voters of Hyde's chief island possession are ready to cast their ballots to be separated from Hyde county. The complaints he makes are first, lack of school supervision, with scarcely a visit from the county school superintendent; second no pay for the teachers; third, no expenditures by the county for maintenance, repairing or construction of bridge; fourth, no appreciable return for their taxes; fifth no holding of teachers' meetings under county supervision.

It is understood here that the people of the quaint little island of Ocracoke have no political axes to grind but are interested in only three things: Decent government, good schools and public improvements.

The Carteret county line now ends at Portsmouth, on the Banks; Hyde county begins north of Ocracoke inlet. Geographically, there fore there would be no objection to Ocracoke being added to Carteret. It would require action by the state legislature before the island could be taken from one county and added to another.

In national politics there would be a realignment in that Ocracoke would be out of the First Congressional district, Lindsay C. Warren's and in the third, C. L. Abernethy's. Ocracoke has about 100 votes with a population of some 600 souls and with an area of 10 miles by one and one-half.

In local circles Supt. Andrews letter does not occasion as much surprise as it might otherwise as the conditions in Hyde county of late as revealed by the press are anything but satisfactory. Three former county managers have been replaced by new ones and the high sheriff is under charges of malfeasance and ordered to appear in Beaufort county Superior court. Dec. 19.

The new bus has accommodations for 17 passengers and is a good looking vehicle.
