Set Out Cuttings To Start New Shrubbery

RALEIGH, Dec. 24—Winter and spring months offer the home gardener a good opportunity to enhance the beauty of the home grounds by propagating more shrubs and flowering plants.

One of the most popular ways of propagating deciduous shrubs is setting out cuttings of stems six to eight inches long, said J. G. Weaver, floriculturist at State College.

The wood of last season's growth should be taken during the fall, winter, or spring months, he said. Be sure that all twigs taken are alive, and do not cut to close to a bud.

When the cuttings are made in winter, Weaver advised that they be stored in a cool cellar in damp sand or peat. Or they may be buried outdoors in well drained sand.

As soon as the soil is in good workable condition in the spring, the cuttings may be set out in the garden in rows 18 inches apart, with the cuttings four inches apart in the row.

The next fall, after the cuttings have grown a little, transplant them to a place where the spacing is wider, so they may develop into a good shape before they are set around the house.

Evergreen shrubs are a little harder to propagate, but the home gardener can do it with a little care, Weaver said.

In the fall, or early winter when the climate is mild, set out evergreen cuttings five to seven inches long. Do not remove any more foliage than necessary to insert the lower end into the sand bed.

Set them in rows four inches apart, with the twigs two to four inches apart in the row. Shade them with laths or burlap during the following summer. They often require 12 to 18 months to develop roots so they can be transplanted.
