WHAT A FISH!

Once the skeleton was surrounded by flesh and scales. At that time it was a sheephead. Today, what is left is one of the many examples of marine life on display in the U. S. Fisheries Station Museum on Piver's Island, which is open to visiting vacationists. Piver's Island is at Beaufort—10 minutes from Atlantic Beach. Gazing at the fish? Miss Catharine O'Bryan and Miss Julia Thomas of Beaufort. (Aycock Brown Photo).

It was a balmy day in summer when a stiff south breeze blew up the sound and made one crave to nap into the light-keeper's chair and woe the winds caresses. What a delightful life it seemed it would be to stay here, with nothing to do but watch the light, and read good books and be visited anon by delightful friends. I never thought the lightkeepers had to paint the buildings and keep it scrubbed and white, to cook their own meals and make their own beds and to be separated from their families weeks at a time. Only the externals recommended themselves.

How the lighthouses must be missed by the captains and the fishermen plying along this bold waterway in fair weather and in foul. What a comfort on a stormy night when the mariner first detects the faithful light for which he has so anxiously watched and which reassures him he is safe from sand bar, or dangerous shore. How lonely the fisherman might be off there to his nets where he could scud down on the light in case of trouble with his craft.

Big or little, on a clear day, crafts sailed close to the lighthouse to give salute with bell or whistle and hear the deep-toned answering bell salute him from the house. Often the salute would be needlessly given, but sportively, to rouse the lightkeeper from his breeze-fanned reverie in the big armchair beside the rail. For he must needs return the salute, and sometimes vexing words instead of cherry greetings were exchanged from rail to rail.

In my boyhood the passing sails were thick and often along this waterway. Churning steamers every day plowed through these waters. The busy artery of commerce has gradually been strangled by huge motor trucks that thunder down the highways, taking toll of life and limb, as well as driving good old boats to bone-yards.

Born maybe thirty years too soon, I deplore the passing of the lighthouses now considered obsolete. It is the taking away of an institution time-honored by its usefulness to humanity, and consecrated by the devotion of the men who kept alight their warming beams. For the going of the lighthouse means also the passing of that delightfully friendly, friend and neighbor, the lighthouse keeper.

Like most men whose daily bread comes from serving humanity, he too was a faithful family man, a man who served his community well, whose home as well as his lighthouse was well-painted and well-kept. He was a man whose generosity reached out to his neighbors, a man who kept his word and paid his debts.

I believe the lighthouses made better men of any men who were called to keep them. For their exacting discipline required their utmost faithfulness to their fellow man as in quest for bread. The daily routine helped to make the lighthouse man exact and sure in all his daily walk, and he became a leading figure in his community. He was sustained also, by the reassurance of steady employment at comfortable wages, and knew that only his misconduct might lose him his job.

Yes, it was a wonderful training school and opening for a livelihood that young men might look forward to. It made better men of good men, the kind of people so sadly needed in this world today. The tearing down of a mere lighthouse, so much wood and iron, is mere incidental in the fast-flying years. But it is a crucifixion of a spirit that dwelled therein and had shed its blessings and beneficence on mankind so long that counts. I call it tragic and I grieve at the rapid going of these fine structures that once so comfortingly dotted the sounds and rivers of Eastern North Carolina.

Increasing

The U. S. Department of Commerce has reported that daily average sales of general merchandise in small towns and rural areas for April were 11 per cent above the same month a year ago.

Since 1932, manufacture of dairy products has increased faster in the North than in the South, according to John A. Arey, extension dairyman at State College.
