Save Your Clover And Vetch Seed Urges Agronomist

Farmers who have crimson clover and vetch now growing have the opportunity to benefit from the European war; those who don't undoubtedly will have to pay more for seed of these two important winter cover and green manure crops next fall. That is the advice of E. C. Blair. Extension agronomist of N. C. State College, who explained that more than half of the crimson clover and vetch seed used in the United States have been imported from Europe, and the war threatens to cut off the supply.

"We urgently recommend that farmers with crimson clover and vetch on their land this spring make arrangements to save seed from at least a part of the crop," Blair declared. "Such farmers will have the opportunity to sell clover and vetch seed at good prices next fall, and they will be doing other farmers of the State a good turn by providing a source of supply.

The agronomist said that the largest yields of crimson clover seed are obtained on soils of medium fertility, where the crop does not grow very rank. "Therefore," he stated, "the more fertile areas should be turned under at the usual time, and the growth on the poorer lands should be left to ripen for seed."

There are several practical methods of harvesting clover seed.

Blair said, one of which is with a comb stripper, which is essentially a wooden comb which is drawn through the crop after the heads are dead ripe. The comb is attached to a box into which the seed fall. The lespedeza seed pan also may be used with minor changes in the lid. The combine, and the common practice of cutting and threshing also work to advantage in saving both clover and vetch seed. Blair offers to send detailed directions on saving clover and vetch seed to any farmer who will write to him at N. C. State College, Raleigh, N. C. County farm agents also are prepared to assist with this problem.
