SAYINGS OF MRS. SOLOMON.

Being the Confessions of the Seven Hundredth Wife—Translated Helen Rowland.

Washington Herald.

Behold, my daughter, though there be fifty-seven varieties of men, yet they come in but two brands—the brand that talketh and the brand that acteth.

Go to! What profiteth it a woman though a man promiseth her the whole world, yet giveth her nothing but attention? For these are cheap.

I charge thee, if a man talketh much gush and flingeth his arms about thee upon slight provocation, cry "Nay nay!" But if he babbleth of platonic friendship and walketh at a great distance apart from thee in the moonlight; if he touchest thine arm with but the tips of his fingers and thay tremble, I say unto thee, prepare thy wedding trousseau. For it is not a cold heart, but cold fear, that keepeth him from proposing.

Lo! platonic friendship is a mysterious thing. Yea, like unto a mackintosh, it covereth a multitude of surprises. It cometh in many guises—and disguises. It is a great convenience.

There is the kind that concealeth a man's desire to kiss a woman and the kind that concealeth his desire to escape her.

The kind that resembleth love and the kind that resembleth a ham sandwich.

The kind with frills—and the kind with thrills.

Go to! Is not the cream always on top of the jug, and the foam always on top of the glass and the icing on top of the cake? Is not the handsomest part of a hotel the entrance thereto, and the sweetest part of a kiss the moment just before taking, and the best part of love the beginning thereof, even platonic friendship! Selah!
