In his opening remarks he counseled harmony a Christian sister die, and she triamong the teachers, attention and investigation of all the subjects presented to them. He out ined the work of the Institute, stating that the principal subjects of the lectures for the week will be Arithmetic, English Grammar and Geography. The first lecture in the morning was devoted to English Grammar, giving an outline of the order in which the subjects should be taken up, and the manner of presenting them to the pupils. The evening was devoted to lecturing on Arithmetic. At 41 P. M., Mr. F. R. Cooper delivered an excellent and appreciative address, counseling them to admire great and good men, and to love what is oure, noble and virtuous, and that would lead them to have the same qualities. The teachers showed their appreciation of the speech by a unanimous vote of thanks.

Years passed on, and one day Madame Sontag, in her glory, was riding through the streets of Berlin, when she saw a little child leading a blind woman, and she said: "Come here, my little child, come here. Who is that you are leading by the hand?" And the little child replied: "That's my mother; that's Amelia Steininger. She used to be a great singer, but she lost her voice, and she cried so much about it that she lost her eyesight." "Ofve my love to her," said Madame Sontag, "and tell her an old acquaintance will eall on her this afternoon."

The next week in Berlin a vast as semblage gathered at a benefit for that poor blind woman, and it was said that Sontag sang that night as she had never sung before. And she took a skilled oculist, who is vain tried to give eyesight to the poor blind woman. Until the day of Amelia Steininger's death Mme. Sontag took care of her and her daughter after that. That was what the queen of song did for her enemy. But, off, hear a more thrilling stery still. "Oh, it's tremendously funny, I dare say!" he growied. "I don't see the joke myself, but to an outsider I suppose it's exquisite. Tisn't often one has the chance of rejoicing over a man wriggling in a dilemma like a worm in a woodpecker's beak. I'd laugh outright, though, if I were you. When there is a smash up the man who holds the reins and does the breaking gets the most comfort out of the affair."

The mention of his cousin's name caused Royal's face to soften, and he let the blood relation frankness of his companion's speech pass. His intercourse Huntley, with Phyllis, restricted as it had necessarily been, had awakened within him a tender, chivalrous devotion, touched and materialized by admiration and a sense of personal possession. Her acceptance of and absolute trust in him, her sweetness, patience and courage, won on him day by day. His professional instinct prevented him from feeling any of that ntangible, egotistic shrinking from affliction inherent in so many men, and the hopefulness of her case caused it to present no bar to her attractiveness. Then, too, it is probable that the consciousness that she was his wife-no matter how she had become so-stirred and influenced his emotions more deeply than he was himself aware.

He was very considerate and gentle with her, having always in mind that time of disclosure which must surely come. He had taken no advantage of the situation, and he intended to take none. Probably his unconscious manliness explained the readiness with which Mrs. Hart had constituted herself his ally. Her own instincts in regard to her sex were tender and protective.

"What are you going to do?" She had risen, for from the room acros the hall there came to her ear the sound of soft music. The blind girl had found her way to the piano, and was cheering her darkness in the manner she loved best. They had left her long enough

Royal squared himself. "It would make a pretty case," he observed impersonally. "The lawyers told me so. That ten minutes to 13time of the death and the ceremonywould admit of considerable argument.
