WAYNE COUNTY.

The remains of Mrs. E. Westcott, of Chapel Hill, was brought to the former home, on yesterday afternoon.

Asparagus is being shipped from here, and if the weather continues favorable garden peas will be in a few days.

We have received a postal card from J. K. Jones in regard to his and his family's subscription. We wish to thank him, if he will give us his address we will do so.

At the Episcopal Church in this town Tuesday morning, Miss Lizzie Smith and Mr. Charles Grainger were married by the Rev. Mr. Smith, that made them "two souls under a single thought, two hearts and one mind."

At the municipal election held on the 1st Monday in May, it must be registered if you intend to attend to it at once. In your full name, its law, important matter to be voted on. The question of bonds or no bonds.

Remember that Mr. R. G. Best and Mrs. Mary Grant, both of this county, were married in New Bern on Friday last. Big is home now from the pleasant smile that illumines his countenance we guess the truth in the report. Well, he will marry, it is fashion, and since Adam tired of working in the Garden of Eden alone and his mother Eve.

How would it do to consult the people of the people of Goldsboro and whether the postoffice shall be moved or not, and no better way than to let them stand upon that question than to place a box at the polls during election and let each voter remove or not remove it. We could be fair and cost nothing. We suggest the people that it be done.

At a meeting at the court house on Tuesday night, for the purpose of discussing the proposition of moving bonds; we were not there, in fact we didn't know there was a meeting and we would have been glad to hear the discussion, we were told that the following resolution was adopted by Mr. I. F. Dortch, was passed: "That upon a favorable vote on moving bonds that none of said bonds should be used for any purpose except the construction of a system of drainage."

A postage stamp hiker has been arrested. EX. This is good news. He had made a contract with a boy to take the stamps of this office, payment by the square yard. The price was quite expensive, but when the United States adhesive stamps which are about three times the old-fashioned postage stamp dealing we saw at once we were glad to relieve us. It is all right to buy and buy a hiker at once.

Will not some of the farmers try an experiment of growing sweet potatoes under the old lazy-bed system this year. Prepare your ground as usual, making it rich and mellow, and smooth; set out your plants and fill between the ridges up to the top of the plants with fine manure. This will prevent the grass from coming; it will keep the ground moist and save the labor of working the plants, and it will prepare your ground for a good crop of anything you may desire to plant there another year. Try it and report your experience.

We were shown a card a few days ago and asked if we could make any use of it. Well we looked at it and could see nothing about it but the picture of some hogs, and not a remarkable looking hogs at all, but by the assistance of a by-stander we found the card could be used as a form for the face of a Clevelevell. We used to have a Clevelevell of opinion of Mr. Cleveland; we differed on the silver question; and we never thought there was any hog in him until shown this card. It is in that the hog forms the present parts of Cleveland; it is a fact.

There is quite a stir in the city over the removal of the postoffice. Some want it kept where it is and others are anxious for it to be moved to the Arlington Hotel. Of course we have no say in the matter, but we heard a gentleman say a few days ago that a Democrat who had remained where it is and was carrying around a petition that purpose was silenced by being told that it was a political issue and was on the wrong side. This is all wrong. The patrons of the office whether they belong to one party or the other should be consulted as their choice where the office should be moved and a majority of them should be allowed to say where it should be.

The circulation of THE CAUCASIAN is steadily increasing, and if circulation should be considered when men are making a place to put their advertisements, we would suggest that THE CAUCASIAN is the medium through which to reach the people. The word to the wise should be sufficient.

MY LADY'S TONGUE.

CHAPTER V.

ACCEPTED AT LAST.

The popping of the laces went on for some two hours, and then Judith could stand it no longer. She was out of the house with her father's field-glass, and stood on the top of a little hill near the ice-house, trying her best to make out how things were going.

She was as white as the fold of the little cambric kerchief crossed over her bosom. There was a horrible weight in her heart, an aching almost past endurance in her throat. She stood there for some moments, but could see nothing for the smoke.

All at once she noticed the figure of a man running, in bold relief against the broad snow-fields before her.

A strange panic got hold upon her. What was about to happen? He came nearer and nearer, and she saw first that he had lost his cap, and then that he had no sword. Nearer he came, and nearer. He was a splendid runner, at all events, and what was very strange, seemed to know the approach to the house quite well. As he came near to the great clump of catalpa trees which grew on the hill-side just before the ice-house, he struck out to the left.

Suddenly Judith gave a cry. The field-glass dropped at her feet. She was looking at her father, and again that terrible cry broke from her.

Twilight was setting in, but she had seen his face quite clearly. It was Dick—Dick, her brother, her father's only son—Dick, the pride of her heart, her soldier—a Virginian. She stood for an instant, her eyes never moving from the corpse into which he had darted, and in that instant she made up her mind.

She rushed to a long cabin some twenty yards away. Uncle Eden was inside; the poor old fellow had sprained his wrist badly some days ago, and he was sitting alone over the smouldering fire with a corn-cob pipe in his mouth.

A moment later he was following Judith down to the cove.

"Dick!" called the girl, softly, "Dick! answer; it is I—Judith."

"Dick!" answered it, with an attempt at bravado. "What of that? I expect if you take the trouble to look you'll see many a poor devil running before the day's over."

"I saw you running," she said again, in that strange whisper.

"I was here," he answered on the ground before him and got hold of his cowardly knees.

"Oh! darling," she said, "oh! my darling. Go back—go back—go back. No one will ever know. You can say you came to get a horse. There is Hautboy—take him and go back. Quick! quick!"

He stood there, ghostly white under the red stains on his face; with his sullen brows drawn down.

"I tell you I'm wounded!" he said. "I've been shot twice in this arm."

"Twice!" she cried. "If it were twenty times, what matter! Oh! Dick!"

"It's my bride arm!" he muttered. "Your bride arm! What! you stand there and tell me that? You—whose father has ridden to hounds many and many a time with his right hand so crippled with gout that he can't wear it in a saddle! Oh! we are wasting time so. Come—come on—Eden's here. He will have Hautboy in a minute. Come, Dick! Come, darling Dick!"

Then he turned on her. He wrenched himself free from her hands, and stood scowling down at her.

"I will not!" he said, with shut teeth, as she herself sometimes spoke. "You think it's very grand, don't you, to come and bully a fellow with one arm helpless, to get on a great fiery steed like Hautboy, and ride into the thick of the danger! That's the way women are brave! Oh yes—pushing men forward into all sorts of danger, and then playing the coward under cover of their own petticoats. Yes, danger—"

"Stop!" said the girl. She got to her feet, but looked at him no longer. "Uncle Eden!" she called.

He stepped forward, his face taking on that strange ashen hue which is the synonym of pallor in a negro.

"Come with us," she said, once more speaking to her brother.

"What are you going to do?" he burst out, querulously. "If you think you're going to force me into going, I'll be—first!"

"Oh! coward—coward!" she said, with a very mirthless smile. And then again, "Coward!"

It went through his very marrow. But he took no step forward. "Come," she repeated. "Don't—don't be afraid!" She smiled again. "I only want you to come to Uncle Eden's cabin, where you will be safe!" Again she smiled.

Then he followed her. Once inside of the cabin she turned sternly upon him.

"Take off your uniform," she said. "I am going for Hautboy. Uncle Eden will stay with you."

"What—what are you going to do?" she gasped, staring at her.

"I am going in your place. Don't snicker; I mean it. Have off your uniform by the time I come back."

He did not in the least believe her, but he took off his clothes as she bade him, more out of a sullen curiosity than anything else. He wanted to see how far she would go.

In ten minutes she was back. He handed her the uniform with a sort of laugh, and she took it without a word. He went down into the cove and load Hautboy, who was saddled with a man's saddle. Half way there she turned and called the old negro, who stood the picture of misery just outside the cabin door.

The vessel will not only fly, but can be easily regulated as to height of flight and course.
