A new London steam plant has been constructed of a character so largely automatic in its various mechanisms as to appear almost independent of human attention. This is particularly marked in the case of the huge boilers, in the management of which, so long as the steam pressore is under 100 pounds, the automatic stokers keep steadily at their work feeding the furnaces, and the steam blast keeps the fires roaring. As, however, the indicator on the pressure gauge creeps up toward the 100 pounds, a driving belt begins to slide off one wheel on to another, and precisely at the maximum pressure the steam blast is shut off, the stokers stop dead, and the fires begin to die down. Then the driving band begins to reverse its movement, and presently the steam blast is turned on, and the fires begin to be fed again. Hon.
