There is no unjust or false opposition on the part of silver men to the BUTLER railroads There is no sentiment in this money question. It is or the very coldest nature of bustness. The roads are mainly owned by men who, on account of the quantity of money they possess, have come to feel that more than one standard of money is a burden to them. They discard the other standard which they consider gross and vo gar, although it is essential to a much larger class of people. This fight is over the effort of one class to avoid in a business way the burden of SENATOR BUTLER'S handling so much money by adding to its excellence, and the struggle on the part of the other class to have some to handle. The only feeling against the railroads is that they are the chief barrier in the way of this latter class in this fight. I warn silv-r men, who are ambitious of the support of this latter class, not to fall netween the lines because of their friendship to the agents and representstives of the owners of these roads, or the false motions that these agents can politically be of use to them. It is dollars and cents that are involved here.
