It will be remembered that, just before the thoughts of the people were turned from their usual channels by the near approach of the war now on, much attention was given to the question of labor in the cotton factories of New Eugland and the Southern States. The cotton interests of Massachusetts secured the introduction in Congress of a constitutional amendment intended to take control of the hours and conditions of labor from the States and place it in the hands of the nation. The same interest attacked the labor laws of Massachusetts in the Legislature of that States. When the war is over the thoughts of the people were turned from their usual channels by the

Mr. Hamryck's official report of the condition of labor in the cotton mills of North Carolina is by no means devoid of interest. He says there is an abundance of labor in the State; that the employers in the mills are better satisfied than any other class, and there is no antagonism better staisfed than any other class, and there is no antagonism better staisfed than any other class, and there is no antagonism the employer nor employer favore legislations on this point, only five peer cent were too progressive tool, for, in answer to questions on this point, only five peer cent were in favor of legislation.
