Cultivation of the Orchard. A correspondent of the Agricultural Epitomist gives some practical points on the care and cultivation of apple orchards which are well worth remembering. We quote as follows:

Apples in a cultivated orchard ripsn later than one that is not cultivated, the fruits hang on the trees better, and it keeps better than fruit which ripens earlier. Fruit trees should occupy the best land on the farm, as it requires a good soil to furnish the constant supply of plant food that is consumed by the trees, for a bearing tree consumes more food from the soil than a tree which does not bear; hence the importance of heavily manuring orchard land. Fall is the best time for setfing trees, for trees set in the fall become well established and are ready to grow when spring comes. The wound in the roots, made by transplanting, heals over during the winter, the soil becomes firm around the roots and resists the drought much better than spring planted trees. The holes which are to receive the trees should be at least three feet square and of sufficient depin. The soil should be thoroughly mixed with well rotted manure and well filled in and pressed among the roots. Trees set in this way will grow twice as rapidly as trees set in a haphazard way All cross limbs and water sprouts should be cut off each year, and shortening the tops annually is advantageous, as trees are then not so liable to break down when loaded with fruit, and the fruit is more easily gathered.

Grass should never be grown in an orchard nor any grain crop, as they tend to draw the moisture from the soil and leave the trees without the necessary supply to mature the fruit and sustain the wood growth. Turning under growing crops of clover and cow peas adds a large quantity of humus to the soil. Potash is generally deficient in old orchards, and to supply this important element of plant food there is nothing better than hard wood ashes applied at the rate of 150 bushels per acre.
