

British Miners Comply With Demands Of Government

Striking Miners Back Down; Sympathetic Strike Averted; Resume Negotiations Monday

London, April 9.—The miners backed down tonight. The triple alliance strike threatened for Tuesday appears averted. A conference between the miners, mine owners and the government has been called for 11 o'clock Monday morning.

Thus, the miners surrendered what they had called their "man weapon" and which only this morning their leaders had definitely declared they would never relinquish.

But even in surrendering it by finally furnishing the guarantee upon which the mine owners and the government had insisted, the miners made it plain that their resolution to show a united and determined front is unbroken.

Yet, in effect, though no solemn written guarantee was handed to the government, the federation's instructions to the members was that was needed to open the door to peace.

A rift in the "strike front" of the triple alliance became apparent during the day, which outwardly was filled with challenges, challenges, threats and counter-threats, giving every appearance of the inevitability of a calamity.

O'CALLAGHAN TO BE ORDERED TO LEAVE COUNTRY

Labor Department Decides That Lord Mayor of Cork Must "Ship Foreign"

Washington, April 9.—Donal O'Callaghan, Lord Mayor of Cork, will be ordered to leave the United States, the Department of Labor decided tonight in co-operation with the State Department.

The decision that the Irish Lord Mayor must leave American shores will be made public by the Labor Department on Monday, it was learned tonight from Secretary of Labor Davis.

Lord Mayor O'Callaghan is not being deported in the strictest sense of the word and neither is any definite time limit being fixed for his departure, but it will be made plain that he must leave this country.

The decision of the Labor Department, when it is made public Monday, will say, it is understood, that the Lord Mayor was given the status of a seaman and the privilege to remain in this country only until he could ship on some vessel bound away from the United States.

The Labor Department will hold that O'Callaghan can not flout this privilege and with it the laws of the United States and that he must leave the United States, or "ship foreign" forthwith.

The decision of the Labor and State Departments in the famous case was learned here with great surprise. The case has had a long career of notoriety, which involved a tilt between the State and Labor Departments under the Wilson administration, which was then thought for a time that the Lord Mayor would be ignored by Secretary of State Hughes and Secretary of Labor Davis.

Almost ever since the interdepartmental friction, which delayed any definite action in the case, arose, the Lord Mayor has been traveling throughout the country, and stating, whenever asked, that he had no intention of leaving the United States.

The decision that O'Callaghan must go was finally reached tonight in an agreement between Secretaries Hughes and Davis. The decision is a departure to follow a long exchange of opinions between the two departments.

Secretary of State Hughes is understood to have rendered an opinion to Secretary Davis that there was no question of political asylum involved in O'Callaghan's remaining in this country, and that the issue in the case was that he had come into this country in violation of the country laws and should be required to leave.

O'Callaghan had been given the status of a "seaman," however, by former Secretary of State Bryan, with the privilege to "ship foreign" from the United States and it was agreed tonight that the Irish mayor would be called on to carry out this agreement and take a ship away from this country.

Under the Department of Labor decision to be announced Monday, it is understood that O'Callaghan will be given a reasonable opportunity to leave this country before any action is taken to deport him forcibly.

Lord Mayor O'Callaghan shipped to the United States to testify here before the American committee investigating conditions in Ireland under British military occupation. A stowaway on a vessel, O'Callaghan entered this country without a passport and was arrested. He was released, however, in the custody of a Federal judge.

The State Department held that he must be deported because of violation of the passport laws, but the Labor Department, which Secretary of State Wilson, claimed jurisdiction in the case since O'Callaghan was a stowaway and classed him as a seaman. This caused great resentment on the part of State Department officials.

The case seemed to be dropped at this point until O'Callaghan's attorneys filed a petition with Secretary of State Coby asking political asylum. It was known to be pursuing O'Callaghan. Hughes believed there had been a clear violation of the passport laws, but since the Labor Department had claimed jurisdiction, it was up to that government agency to see that O'Callaghan left the country.

TEXAS PANHANDLE IS PROPERTY OF INDIANS

Washington, April 9.—The whole Texas panhandle, Oklahoma City, Tulsa and many acres of oil lands in Oklahoma belong to the Cherokee and Osage Indians and not to the present holders, it was held by the Supreme Court today. Taylor submitted to the court a certified copy of what he claimed to be the original deed, signed in 1839 by Martin Van Buren, then president of the United States, turning this land over to the Cherokee and Osage Indians.

"I've been working eighteen months on this and I am satisfied that land belongs to the Indians," Taylor said. He said that his father's will made reference to the deed which has been lying forgotten for many years in the Indian Commissioner's office at Pawhuska, Oklahoma.

Taylor said he expected to be given a hearing by the court probably in October. He asked the a receiver be appointed meanwhile to protect the property interests of the Indians.
