Good Weather Has A Depressing Effect On Market,

Co. say. The first taste the market bas had of that spring feeling. The strange part of it all is that no one seems to realize the change spring always brings over face of things. Few days of good weather and the outlook is very different from that in the winter. For time being those who need cotton seem to spin sentiment. Its impossible to say how it occurs. It simply is so. This for the time being. Then when it is found that no cotton is coming out why, consumers come into the market again as buyers is we have endeavored to point out for some time, there are two phases to the present outlook. One is the planting season and good weather operating against an advance. The seconds is strong statistical position and the supply and demand of actual cotton which may come into play later. Now for the third day we have had good weather. This is the first time it has happened in three or four months. Because, we have not had this good weather we have been cautious on the short side. But with good weather, movement will be larger and market casier. We would rather sell August on every advance as long as weather
