A veteran of the civil war, in Jack-Eng. Mourns son's Corps, he was on the firing-line in 17 hard-fought battles and eight skirmishes, and was twice severely wounded. He loved to live over in reminiscence the thrilling days of '61-65, and was full of interesting or humorous stories of those times. He was devoted to his division general, Gen. Pender, and one story in particular he never tired of recounting, often in his sermons where he could use it to point a moral, was of a time when the general rode up before his men in a charge up a steel hill against the enemy. As he dashed to the front he cried out: "Come on, boys! Make all the fuss you can, and remember that Pender is
