Eight thousand and four feet of ice high as the Yoho glacier of Canada. Since the first discovery of this largest of Canada's glaciers it has maintained a grand archway of ice at its lower 95% extremity. The span of this arch is 91/2 no less than 250 feet, and its height is estimated at 70 feet, while from beneath the arch the drainage escapes. The formation of the arch seems to be an annual phenomenon. Toward the close of the summer it becomes weakened by melting and the whole structure collapses. The ice gradually is broken up and finall removed and the formation of a new archway is commenced From the archway issues the Yoho river. It is calculated that an avalanche must have occurred in 1850 or 1860. Since then the retreat of the glacier has been at the average rate of five or six feet a year. From August, 1901, to August, 1904, it was found that the retreat has been 11 feet, or 37 feet a year, Between August, 1904, and August, 1905, the glacier receded but nine feet, and is now thought

o to be checked. About the nose of the glacier there is evidence of a bodily disruption of the rock strata, to which the term "plucking" is applied. Rock layers are ripped off where the layers are thin bedded and pointed, and the faggments are pressed into the ice to assist it further work. The Yoho glacier is an almost if not entirely isolated example of a glacier as a great engine of erosion. Other glaciers move forward and are engines of transportation.
