A representative of the Standard spent a day, recently, on the Yadkin river; or as the young college orator, after a sweeping gesture of his whole arm, would exclaim, "upon the wild rushing waters of the grand and historic old Yadkin," or words to that effect.

He was on the Stanly side, never once crossing over to the Montgomery side; for over there up above the point in question is what is familiarly known as the "Devil's Den." Den, and that he has returned may be alone due to the fact, his companion was too pure, too bright and have secured the release of him, who rushed in where he should not have rushed, However, Mr. Jno. Blackwelder said: That may be the Devil's Den, but he wasn't to home, when I was there." Just so!

No man has ever gone through these rapids save upon one occasion In 1882, Dr. Henry Betts, (who is now dead), Hon.
