JAKE NEWELL WRITES FROM GOLDSBORO.

Dear Mr. Cook: In this part of our grand old State an "up-country cracker" finds so many things that are so different to home that he cannot help noticing the wonderful contrast. I have now been here a week, nearly, and carefully say that I have not found a single thing, except the kind hospitality of the people, to remind me of home; and yet we are all within the bounds of the good Old North State. The mode of farming and the crops raised are different; the people speak and act different; the country, even the forests and the singing of the birds are all different.

Goldsboro is a thriving young city, and destined to soon become the inland metropolis of Eastern Carolina. It is a railroad centre, has foundries, machine shops, saw mills, furniture factories, cotton factories, rice mills, and an ice factory. It is a great lumber market. The large saw mills here and in the country are supplied with timber from the great forests by and by forestmen who raft logs down Neuse river. And, my, my, what grand timber it is! I saw some scaffolding the workmen put around the courthouse to do some work, and the single pieces of straight heart pine stretched clear to the top of the great two story building, and I don't know how much was cut off the top end.

The first capital of Wayne county was not Goldsboro, which was built on the banks of the Neuse two miles from the present courthouse. Waynesboro, got to be a considerable village but overflows, and fever drove the inhabitants away from the river, and Goldsboro was built. The only traces left of the old county seat are broken crockery, brick bats and a few garden spots where houses stood. Large lumber mills now occupy the buried city's site.

Truck farming is becoming quite a valuable industry here. The success of it lies in the diversification of the crops. They make a crop of sugar peas, then a crop of beans, and then a crop of cotton or corn on the same land. Many broad fields that last fall I saw in cotton are now ripening off a crop of beans, but next November they will be white with the living snow. To see the Irish potato fields down here would paralyze John Cook, of the poor house, in his boots, and a glimpse at a peach orchard here would provoke Capt. McDonald to one of his good-natured chuckles. Grapes grow well and native wines need no recommendation, but all brandy and whiskey must have "Mountain" on it in order to receive respectable notice.

Goldsboro is the home of that queer political character, ex-Governor Brogden. He is a well read, kind hearted man, but altogether without pride. He has about retired to private life, but is hail and hearty. He is to Wayne what the venerable Billy Bost was to Cabarrus. About the only service he renders his party now is to outwind old Sol and cause him to set before he gets through with his speech, thus preventing his Democratic opponent from making a speech. I have seen him walk the streets of Goldsboro without a coat or vest, with his shirt sleeves rolled up and his collar laid open two or three buttons-deep.

Evangelist Mite is holding a great meeting in this city. He thunders them heavy, and, in the language of some one, "they are his'n." He says he could take some of the self-righteous christians in Goldsboro and spit them through the bill of a misquito into the eye of a flea and they would not make him wink. He preached to the colored brethren this afternoon, and I confess that I never before discovered the rich melody of the darkeyes voice. The evangelist would not let them shout and it was to be greatly feared that the great tent and the immense congregation would be wiped out of existence by "spontaneous combustion."

I think if I was to stay in this country long the mosquitos would take me, dead or alive. The hay held several caucuses just outside of my room to arrange a course of procedure. I think they have taken the plan of old and are marching around the wall tooting their trumpets. If they are not expecting the walls to fall they are waiting for the door to be opened or the sash raised. The sand fly is worse than the mosquito. Now, the mosquito will wait to place his feet in good position before he bites you, but the sand fly will bite you before he alights. I have had my hand drawn when I saw one was going to sit down on me, and before I could strike he had bitten me.

Respectfully,
J. F. NEWELL.

There are people who seem to have an idea that they attract attention in heaven for their piety every time they buy a dish of ice cream at a church festival.
