CONCORD, APRIL 22 1897.

The Greeks and Turks have at last begun fighting in earnest, and the eyes of the world are turned toward the combat. If Turkey and Greece fight it out alone, the contest is apt to be an unequal one. Turkey can raise 300,000 fighting men, while Greece alone cannot muster over 100,000. There are hopes, however, that Grecian sympathizers in Macedonia, Montenegro, Bulgaria, and other of the south-eastern European countries which have known the oppression of the Turk in the past will come to the aid of Greece. Macedonia belongs to Turkey, but will be invaded by Greece, and, as the Macedonians have been longing to be allied or connected with their southern kinspeople, it is believed that they will fight Turkey in the present struggle. Russia would like to get control of Constantinople, in order to have the Dardanelles as an outlet from the Black Sea. But England will say nay to this, for fear that Russia, once in power there, will encroach upon English domain in the Indian Empire. The outcome of the war will be watched with intense interest.—Charlotte Observer.

Prof. Ramsey, the versatile and accomplished gentleman who is able to edit the Progressive Farmer with one hand and discharge the duties of a fifteen hundred dollar office with the other, said in last week's issue of his noble paper, at the conclusion of an editorial which was in effect an apology for accepting relief (after having for years denounced office-holders in general), and after saying of this office in particular that if he took it he should feel that he was stealing, that he hoped he would not have to refer to the subject again. Doubtless, too, he wishes that no one else would.—Statesville Landmark.

Romantic But True.

From a source that we regard strictly reliable we get the following touching story:

Miss — and Mr. —, both of Stanly county became infatuated with each other and as courtship further fixed the cords of real love with her, at least, a ring was passed from him to her, with the initials of both engraved within, as an endless bond of affection and a seal to their marital engagement.

All was joyful anticipation of happiness in the possession of other in life's consummations.

But alas! that dread disease, consumption made its appearance on this charming prospective bride and swept as an erasing sponge over the picture of happiness they had been painting.

The lady did not love the less but exercised her sense of prudence above that of impulsive love and told him, the object of her heart's affection, that she would not live long and thought it best that they postpone marriage. Against this he protested in vain and probably to the degree of exasperation, for, as they strolled sorrowfully by the murmuring and rippling waters of a creek in that community that ring became the burden of discussion. He claimed the return of the ring if it did not seal their marriage vows, but she plead for it as a solace partially compensating the loss of himself which was but the stroke of the Divine hand and not the choice of her own. Thus these hearts that had been knitting closer and closer were now entangled in loves inextricable meshes. He insisted on removing the ring but she told him she would contrive to wear that ring and even die with it on her finger though he should take it from her and place it on the finger of a new lover. In the throes of love's distracting freaks he then and there removed the ring and threw it into the stream.

While waiting for that disease to do its deadly work and in her musings of ambitions blighted and revelations soon to unfold to those who pass over the river, she took a hook and line and was angling along this same stream. About 300 yards below the point where she saw the ring drop and sink she caught a catfish. On taking the fish off the hook she saw a glittering bright substance and there to her great joy she drew from its gills the very same ring and placed it again on her finger and lived her few remaining months and died and was buried with the ring on her finger, from which her lover in the desperation of disappointed hopes had taken it. In the meantime he had torn himself from the scenes that would forever bring a returning pang and sought forgetfulness in distant parts.

She, though, had the minor triumph, too, of informing him of her coveted possession ere the appearance of the death angel that placed that ringed hand in his and transported her across the chilling stream to realms of the eternal rest.
