A Defense of the Men Who Stand for the People Against the Interests.

Senator Dolliver, in an extended speech recently defined the difference between insurgents and those Republican reactionaries whose chief idea of public duty is to follow the organization. He made it very "I, James W. Wadsworth, do make clear that it is no part of the plan of the insurgents to wreck the Republican party and that they will be the last to attempt such a move, but that they do intend to hold the party the abuse they have received at the hands of the regulars. He showed too, how the President had allowed himself to be led into embrassing mistakes by taking the "organization's" view of things.

"I am not for those," said Senator Dolliver, "who have enjoyed any controversy within the Republican party, have always been a disciple of party peace, or party harmony, of party good will among the members associated together for political purposes. I have never been able even to comprehend the bitterness with which mn are in these days reviled for their opinions within the Republican party.
