Raleigh, N. C., March 10. (By the Associated Press).—Sons of hard toil and steady brain-work, engineers of the North Carolina Highway Comning machine, are working every day, regardless of weather conditions, to complete the state's $65,000,000 road building program, which, when completed, will total approximately 2,000 miles of hard surface highways.

So smoothly is this machine working that if it rains one day and stops over 4,500 miles of unpaved roads in the state, under maintenance by the highway department, will have been drag ged before the end of the next day. In some sections, the engineers have to ride miles on horseback to their work, HELD UP OTHER being unable to operate automobiles on account of the road conditions. Yet, in six months or alyear these sections will be accessible through modern highways.

When a decision is reached by coun Communication With the road, the chief engineer sends one of y and state authorities to build a new his engineers in the district to make an inspection. When the report is completed, it is submitted to the chief engineer, who holds a conference with the highway commissioners involved SEVERE DAMAGE and a decision reached as to the location of the road.

The plans and recommendations of the engineer then go to the drafting and planning department in Raleigh, where they are studied and improved if possible. The location of materials plays an important part in the decis ion reached as to the road to be con structed. The division which designs bridges work out plans for the type of bridges to be placed over waterways intersecting the highway. After the contract has been granted for the construction, all plans are placed in the hands of the contractors.

A state highway inspector takes up start work and remains on the job until the work is completed. He sees that all materials are mixed properly and tested and that all specifications
