IN A KING'S TREASURE HOUSE

Two Rooms in Windsor Castle Are Filled With Treasure. London, Nov. 21.—In Windsor Castle there are two small rooms, a catalogue of whose contents reads like a chapter from the "Arabian Nights."

There are candelabra of gold of beautiful craftsmanship, any one of which a strong man could scarcely lift; gold dinner services, one of which is said to have cost nearly one and a half million dollars—flagons and tankards, treasures and entire dishes, plates by the hundred, all of ponderous gold and exquisitely chased; gold-plate of every conceivable description and of every age, the total value of which is at least $10,000,000, and its weight many tons.

And this is but a small part of the royal treasures scattered in pordigal profusion over the king's homes, from Balmoral Castle to Buckingham Palace, and on which thousands of eyes have feasted. There are, however, many other royal treasures which only the eyes of a favored few have looked on, and which, though of less value, are perhaps of more interest to the outside world.

There is, for instance, at Windsor a private museum which has rather a romantic history, and which comparatively few have seen. In this museum, arranged in glass cases, are many objects of singular interest. In one case is a remarkable collection of feather cloaks, presented nearly a century ago by the king of the Sandwich Islands to George IV., each cloak fashioned from tens of thousands of feathers taken from birds of gorgeous plumage and cunningly worked into patterns of many-hued beauty.

So rare and beautiful are these cloaks that each of them has been valued at $50,000.

Said he: "Darling, say the words that will make me the happiest man in the world."

"Well, stay single," she replied.
