THE DYING BRIDE

The fold him she was dying-they had marked her fading he lih, They had heard her plaintive murmurs, who of reason she was reft, As with all her tearful pleadings, she would call upon his name,

And chide her friends for thinking, he would n ver come again.

Was she not his own-his chose n-his plightof promised bride? He had vowed to come and claim her, what ever fate betide, Still her brow grew daily paler-too well they a read her doom, For the heatic flush of scarlet filled their lov ing hearts with gloom.

Trey tell bim he was dying-they had watched the wildering light, Of the blue eyes once so softened gleaning, now so strangely bright.

She would rave of their last meeting, of the vows breathed o'er an o'er, When with hope their hearts were beating and they would part no more!

Then moaning on her pillow, she would twine her silken hair, And in murmuring, broken tones, breathe a simple carnest prayer,

Or murmuring some low melody, with | laintive, gushing sadness, She, like an angel whispering, telling of hopand gladness.

Trey told him she was dying-his idolized-In voiceless agony of woe, he hastened to her Alas for fate ! he came too late - the spirit long

Yes, beautiful, though now sorold is the silent youthful face. Grief has passed sadly e'er her brow and death has lelt no trace ; One pale, white hand has gently clasped a rose bud withering dead, Fit e able a of the weary heart when love an sorrow fled.

TO ----I look upon thy free but while

It Waks so bright and fair. I ask me if that sunny smile. Is wont to linger there-I ask me if that bosoms heave Hides not a heart that's doomed to grieve,

And wither in despair I ask if peace and joy can be. With beings desolate as thico.

I knew thee not, thou fallen flower, While virtue marked thy growth-I knew thee not in thy bright hour Of purity and truth. I knew thee not till trencherous ways, Had dimmed the sunshine of thy days,

The freshness of the youth. There's beauty still upon thy brow, And kindness in thy heart ; That smile is with thee even now.

All hopeless as thou a t. But sorrow's wave too soon will chase, The light of beauty from thy face. An I thou wilt then depart, As bends the lily to the blast, Unknown, unloved, thou it sink at last.

God cheer thee on that dreary day, For who will watch thy bed-Wro sigh to see thee p saway, Who grieve for thee when dead? Who'd seek the lonely silent spot, Where all forsiken and forgot, Reclines thy lovely head. The turf alas will soon be green, And none will know that thou hast been.
