WHAT IS HEAVEN?

"What is heaven?" I asked a little child: "All joy!" and in her innocence she smiled. I asked the aged, with her care oppressed; "All suffering o'er, oh! heaven, at last, is rest!" I asked a maiden, meek and tender eyed; "I must be free," she modestly replied. I asked an artist, who adored his art; "Heaven is all beauty!" spoke his raptured heart. I asked the poet, with his soul afloat; "Tis glory—glory!" and he struck his lyre. I asked the Christian, waiting her release; "A halo round her, low she murmured: 'Peace!'"

So all may look with hopeful eyes above, 'Tis beauty, glory, joy, rest, peace and love! Philadelphia Call.

A Surprise

AN EPISODE—FROM LOVE IN DEATH.

BY WILLIAM SHARSWOOD.

The characters in this scene are Michael a valet to Baron Wied, and Ida an attendant on Levangetine Conness Mandersten.

Scene—A woody place adjoining the grounds attached to Count Mandersten's Mansion.

Michael. Didn't know that it was of any use,—scratched on it,—and burnt it for waste paper.

Enter Ida, with a bouquet of yellow roses in her hand.

Ida. Good day to you, Monsieur Michael—how passes the day with you?

Mich. Ask of my note.

Ida. Where is it?

Mich. Ask of master's coachman's daughter,—ask of the fire.

Ida. It's not burnt?

Mich. She did not know that it was of any use,—scratched on it, and burnt it for waste paper.

Ida. Of what did it speak?

Mich. Of woeful absence from thee, to be sure, for the last twelve hours.

Ida. Truly?

Mich. As you are an angel.

Ida. Not a fallen one, from whom you have any harm to look for?

Mich. Nay, nay, an archangel.

Ida. (Observing for the first time the difference in the color of his stockings.) Oh, my!

Mich. What's that?

Ida. Oh, you'll kill me with laughter!

Mich. You don't understand me!

Ida. Did eyes ever behold the like!

Mich. The like!—why I was handsome yesterday!

Ida. Oh, Michael, do look at your stockings!

Mich. Yes—I've lost another stocking—

Ida. How,—not by that dog again?

Mich. This time, it blew off the clothes' line, and master's coachman's daughter lost all sight of it. Those stockings, the only relic that my grand sire left when he was forced to leave his native France, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes.

Ida. But still you have got one pair remaining.

Mich. But how?

Ida. Why the dog tore one hose of the first pair,—and the wind took one of the second pair, and still there's two remaining.

Mich. Yes, but they are each of a different color: and apropos, let me tell you another morning's incident—

Ida. This daughter of your master's coachman must have some designs on you.

Mich. Believe me, you have no need to fear jealousy now: but when I was seated at the table, where she sat at my right hand, I could not help observing that her eye was constantly and steadily fixed on me. It was not for me to take notice of it at first, judging, as any one would, that it was due to the attractive power of my personal charms, and that time would induce her to some bolder device. But finding that my face was still the object to which her eyes were directed, I began to grow much abashed at my own modesty, when, to my sorrowful satisfaction, master informed me, that the eye which I thought had been so steadily fixed on me, and excited my vanity was only a glass eye, and was as unmeaning in its look by day, as it was quiet at night, when it rested on her toilet table, by the side of her glass.

Ida. From high expectations often comes ground and lofty tumbling.
Mich. (Kneeling and taking her hand.) As lowly as I am now,—the sight of these yellow rases has made me feel years younger, for since I have seen them in your hand these five minutes, I have become in love with a woman, who, if she be still alive must be five years within my own age.
Ida. Then you have—have loved before?

Mich. Let me tell you the story—it is the remembrance of which, yet refreshed by the sight of that rose, that, even now, does not fail to agitate me to an extreme degree. I was twenty years of age; that was thirty years ago, when my uncle announced to me one morning, that he determined on placing me in the army, in a regiment that had been raised in our village. I must confess to my being greatly shocked at this,—not that I had any distaste to a military life, for I should have wished to have seen nothing more to my taste, than to find myself in a uniform, surrounded by the roll of the drum—but I was in love! nor, indeed, did I venture to speak a word of this to uncle, for I well knew, as there was an old faction between the families, he would have urged my enlistment, if for no other reason than to thwart my attaining the thought of my days and nights. But I fixed on another plan. I had another uncle of nearly the same age as I am at this time, who had much fondness for young folk, and had the good sense to be never better pleased than when he made the occasion of pleasing others—he made himself the confidant and protector of all the youth of the neighborhood,—assisted every worthy applicant in cases of debt—

Ida. (Interrupting.) But what did he do in your case?
Mich. As I was just about saying—I went to his house, and said to him,—Dear uncle, I had fallen into a misfortune. "You don't know what that means," said he. Don't joke, uncle. "I will bet you, that you have met with no misfortune." Now, uncle, I have too much consideration to be the occasion of your losing, which you most undoubtedly would. "Well, tell me, then, what has befallen you?" Uncle Joseph has told me, that he has decided that I shall enlist. "There's no misfortune in that,—for setting aside the risk of life, you have always promotion in view." Yes, always in view, answered I. "Are you wanting in courage?" Oh! no. "Well, then, I can't understand that you have any reason for not wishing to be a soldier." The reason is—that—that—I wish to be married. "Bah!" that is no consolation for one in love! "I should like to be in love myself, once more, up to my neck.—But, tell me, who this girl may be?" Uncle, she is an angel! "Oh! yes, I don't doubt but she is an archangel—but what earthly name does she answer to?" Her name is Ida. "That is her christian name, I want to know her family name." I hesitated at this,—knowing that there had been years ago, a faction between the families—I nevertheless answered his demand by telling him her name is Ida Amelot.
