would have been about as welcome to A. Cooper of Oswego, N. Y., as a merciless lung-racking cough that defied all remedies for years. "It was most troublesome at night," he writes, "nothing helped me till I used Dr. King's New Discovery which cured me completely. I never cough at night now." Millions know its matchless merit for stubborn colds, obstinate coughs, sore lungs, lagrippe, asthma, hemorrhage, croup, whooping cough, or hay-fever. It relieves quickly and never fails to satisfy. Advocate Deep Plowing.

To the Editors of The Lexington Dispatch:

Fall plowing is a subject of interest more or less to all farmers at this season of the year. The question naturally comes up: Should we plow deep? What are its advantages? There's no more important question connected with our stiff compact clay soils than getting them thoroughly pulverized. Now, our old friend (in this case) Jack Frost can do more in one night to pulverize soil than a man with a team and a drag harrow can in perhaps two days. Let's utilize him. He ought to make some return for the great amount of our early fruit he eats in the early spring. Now it is a fact of common observation that the frost and cold rains can penetrate deeper when the soil is broken up loose by plowing than if left compact from the summer's cultivation and rains. The soil is hereby subjected to the same process of weathering that the rocks were from which the soil originally came.

One of the problems of building a soil is to get of sufficient depth, ten or twelve inches at least. This can be done only by plowing to that depth and filling the plowed earth with humus. The raw clay turned up three or four inches from below the present fertile soil means the loss of a crop the first season for want of sufficient vegetable matter in the fresh upturned clay. Yet on account of the weathering effects of the winter's frosts and rains one can turf up this raw clay with greater impunity in the fall than any other season of the year. Now my advice is if you are intending to let your land lay bare just as the small grains, the corn or the cotton crops were harvested off it, plow it deep and leave broken and uneven that it may get the pulverizing effects of the winter weather and that the cut worms and many other hurtful insects may be killed.

But it should not be left bare. All our lands in this southern climate should have a winter cover crop. If your land after being turned up by the plow is not sufficiently fertile to produce crimson clover, vetch or some other of the more desirable crops, in such a case there's nothing to beat rye. Suppose now you have a field you intend to plant in corn next season following a wheat or other small grain crop this year. Now you turn under the crop of rag weeds that always follow a small grain crop, just as they begin to bloom for seeding, the time all green manures should be turned under. Sow the field in rye. Next spring there'll be another humus making crop to turn under. In plowing this one under the first would be brought back near the surface in just about that state of decay to be immediately available for the young growing corn. Later in the summer season the rye will be sufficiently decayed to be available for the corn in the latter stages of its growth, when the soil has reached that stage of fertility that crimson clover or vetch can take the place of the rye, the problem of the fertility of the soil will be much nearer a solution.

These are not all but just some of the arguments for deep fall plowing.
