Highways and the Farmer

It is a fact that a farmer located on a good road soon gets the up-to-date farming habit, and those who haven't noticed it are invited to take a look along the good roads of North Carolina and take special notice of the improvement of the farms. They are also invited to jot down the increased productivity of the better farming that seems to go hand in hand with a good road, and especially to make note of the increased value of farm lands brought about by higher records in production and because of the easier and more economical means provided by improved highways in getting farm products to market.

Of course it is all right to consider the use of good roads for the use of vehicle and automobile travel, for that greatly enhances community values and largely increases the opportunities and pleasures of country life, but when we think of improved highways we place above all considerations their chief utility in magnifying the agricultural interests of the country.—Wilmington Star.
