

More Pay For Rural Carriers.

The House Committee on Post-offices and Post Roads is said to have decided upon an increase of salary for rural carriers.

This increase, it is said, will amount to about $50 a year on standard routes and will be applied to other routes in proportion. Assuredly there's no branch of the service in which the employes are more deserving of consideration in connection with salary enlargement.

The rural carriers work for the money they get and the establishment of the parcel post has added materially to their labors. They are compelled to furnish their own wagons and the augmented bulk of the mail that they are carrying will make it necessary in many instances for them to provide larger vehicles than they are using at present.

The carriers are assigned about as much territory as they can cover adequately, and with due regard for promptness, under the most favorable conditions. A route that is carried easily during the long summer days and at a season when the country roads are in their best condition assumes a very different aspect in winter when the weather is severe and the roads are muddy or covered with snow or sleet.

It is during the winter that the energies and resources of the carriers are most strongly taxed.

In the days of many star routes before the rural free delivery system had been established the contractors got rich while the men who actually carried the mails scarcely were paid enough to keep body and soul together but the iniquitous system prevailed for many years before it was discarded.

The rural carriers are paid salaries and consequently fare better than did the star route carriers. There can be no disputing the fact that they earn all that they are paid.

They get no "easy money" at any stage of the game and in view of the additional burden that has been imposed by the parcel post it is no more than fair that they should have more additional compensation.
