

2 Acres in Fruit Most Profitable Part Farm

I have an orchard of about two acres. In it I have about 50 peach trees which ripen from May to September, 15 apple trees, Grimes Golden and Delicious, 10 plum trees of different varieties and 3 Scuppernon vines, some Pineapple and Kieffer pears, 6 May cherries, 15 figs, and some pecans. I filled in between pecans with peaches, apples, pears, plums, and figs. We have an arbor for the James and Scuppernon vines. Strawberries are in the whole orchard. We keep the trees properly pruned and sprayed.

Our orchard is near the house, and as we live in town, we have no trouble in selling most all of our fruits, and we usually get above the market value because we grade properly and have better, sounder, and nicer fruit. Folks call for it and pay a premium price gladly. When we have a surplus, we either can it or make preserves, jams, and jellies, which we have no trouble selling in winter. We have fruits fresh or in preserves and jellies, on our table three times daily. Two fruit stands handle our fruits retail and get it fresh daily, in season. We lose no time going about peddling because we have such nice fruit folks come after it. Our orchard is seven years old. We have other business and farming interests, but we consider the orchard our very best paying investment, counting time, acreage and the small amount invested in its upkeep. I find different varieties ripening at different times, and proper attention to every tree, the main things that pay in the home orchard. —R. L. Darnell, in The Progressive Farmer.

How To Use Milk

Whole milk is the best form of milk for the child, because all parts of milk—fat, sugar, protein, minerals, and vitamins are necessary for growth. Children properly trained from infancy will drink milk at every meal. Most dislike for it has been suggested to children by the parents' distaste for it.

Milk may be used in cocoa, egg-nog, white sauce, milk gravy, creamed dishes, milk puddings, sherbets, and ice cream.—The Progressive Farmer.

Suggestions For Hog Killing Time

Good pork does not come from an inferior hog. The quality of pork depends as much on the breeding and feeding of the hog as on its proper curing. Good pork is not obtained from large over-fat hogs; those weighing from 175 to 225 pounds live weight make the best meat. But the type of hog is also important. The "pony built," chuffy, fat hog type does not produce the best pork. The "bacon" or lean meat type, that reach the above weights at from 8 to 10 months old make the best pork.

Cool weather is necessary to curing meat in the South. This does not mean extremely cold weather, when the meat is likely to freeze. It does mean dry, cool weather continued for, say, 48 hours. The weather must be cool enough to thoroughly cool out the carcass, say a temperature from 35 to 45 degrees, but preferably from 35 to 40 degrees. If there is danger of the cool weather not lasting it is best to kill in the late afternoon.

Hogs should not be fed for 24 hours before killing, although they should be given what water they will drink, at least up to a few hours before they are killed. They should never be excited or overheated just before they are killed. Under such conditions they will not bleed out properly. It is not necessary and usually is not advisable to stun a hog before sticking him. If the hog is stuck properly without being stunned he will bleed out better, although some prefer to first stun him, for humane reasons.

The sticking of a hog is something of an art and requires care and practice. The hog should be held firmly and squarely on his back. A narrow, long-bladed knife is best. The blade should be about eight inches long. The knife should enter six to eight inches in front of the breast bone and be inserted six or seven inches. The point of the knife should point toward the root of the tail and kept squarely in the center so as not to wound either shoulder. The purpose is not to pierce the heart; in fact, this should be carefully avoided. When the knife is inserted it should then be turned and withdrawn in such a manner as to sever the large arteries at the entrance to the chest. After sticking, the hog may be turned on one side with the hind parts highest and every effort to cause it to bleed out well.

The scalding is an important detail, as the hair is much more easily and thoroughly removed and the carcass presents a better appearance if the scalding is properly done. A barrel makes a convenient vessel for holding hot water, but if a large enough barrel is not available, or if for any reason the hog cannot be submerged in the hot water, then the hair may be removed by thoroughly wrapping the carcass in sacks or blankets and pouring the water over it. The temperature of the water is important. In fact, it is important enough to justify the use of a thermometer to measure it. If the water is not warm enough it will not loosen the hair and if it is too hot it will "set" the hair and make "scraping" difficult. The right temperature is stated all the way from 145 to 165 degrees. From 150 to 160 should be carefully aimed at.

A teaspoonful of lye or a small shovel of wood ashes should be added to 25 to 30 gallons of water. If the water is heated in the house and carried outside and put into a cool vessel, it should be boiling when taken off the fire, but care should still be taken to have the temperature right when the scalding takes place.

The hog should be kept moving in the water, turned from side to side, and withdrawn occasionally to try if the hair and scurf remove easily.

The removal of the internal organs should be done promptly and carefully. The blood should be washed out with cold water or it may be wiped out with a clean cloth and wrung dry out of warm water. The leaf fat should be removed to hasten cooling out. The head should be removed. It takes an expert to split the backbone evenly, and it is not good practice to chop down each side of the backbone, so the best plan is to saw down the middle of the backbone.

There is no more important step in the whole process of slaughtering and curing than the proper cooling or chilling of the carcass. This is the point where many failures in home pork curing occur. The carcass should be hung in a cool, clean place until thoroughly cooled out.

Artificial cooling may be done by the use of one-half to one pound of ice for every pound of pork. Pack thoroughly in ice and allow to remain until ice is pretty well melted, then take out and dry, when salting and curing may be done as when cool weather effects the cooling.—The Progressive Farmer.
