Put Business Into Farming

"Agriculture is the basis of American prosperity. Its decline means ultimate loss, if not disaster, to industry in general; and it is because of this fact that there is a basis of equity in the demand of the farmers of the country for conditions, through legislation or otherwise, tending to stabilize the industry of agricultural production. The farmer insists that something of a special kind shall be done for his relief. How and what manner, it is the business of practical statesmanship to find out. And it is a serious business; the country cannot go on prosperously if the farmer is a constant and increasing loser as compared with factors in the industrial life of the country."—San Francisco Bulletin.

Probably the one thing above all others which the farmer needs is not only a thorough knowledge of farming but a better business training. The electric power companies of the United States, in their programs to take electricity to the farmer, have made a start in the work of training, along business lines.

Electricity on the farm will teach farmers the advantages of power. Power will add to the output of farm labor. As production per man and per acre is increased, the farmer will of necessity absorb more businesslike ideas regarding farming. If ten acres under "power production" can be made to produce what 100 acres is now raising, the position of the farmer as a business man will be materially advanced. Electricity has made the start. Machinery manufacturers and financial institutions must follow suit.

Customer ownership and the sale of stocks and bonds to millions of individuals has been demonstrated a practical method of financing electric light and power companies and other utilities. Why cannot long time mortgage securities on farms be sold to the public in a manner similar to the securities sold on public utility properties? Is it not practical to figure out an easy method for farmers to handle their financial problems over a period of years with small annual payments?
