New Miracles Of The Photoelectric Cell
By James D. Purdy
Director, Schools of Electrical Engineering, International Correspondence Schools

TRANSMISSION of light impulses into electrical impulses through the medium of a photoelectric cell is the basis of a newly invented method for the transmission of color photographs over long distance telephone circuits. In a recent demonstration of the method a three-color photograph was transmitted by telephone from Chicago to New York.

The United States Bureau of Standards has developed a balloon device to determine the safe flying ceiling during foggy weather. As the balloon ascends a photoelectric cell measures the light at different levels. Varying brightness of the light causes a change in the pitch radio signal which the device its to the recorder on the ground.

A photoelectric cell is used for measuring the distance from a wall or other flat surface. A hollow metal sphere is brought into position with its opening against the surface to be measured. Light is directed into the sphere through a tubular arm. An observer's eye accurately measures the amount of light reflected from the surface.
