Stories Of Stokes County Hunters

There are some smart dogs in the world, but we doubt if anywhere in the State of North Carolina can be found a dog with more sense than Mr. Gene Martin's hound at Meadows, Stokes county.

Mr. Martin relates the following facts which are so extraordinary that the attention of Mr. Believe-It-Or-Not Ripley will be called to this remarkable instance of dog-sense so that it may be spread to all corners of the country.

Now, here are the facts: Mr. Martin is very fond of rabbit hunting, and always keeps one or more hounds that can pick up a rabbit on a straight run, or will chase him around in a curve close to the hunter to enable a fair shot.

But some months ago Mr. Martin, out on his hunts, found that invariably the rabbits when jumped by the dogs would make for a hole under a big rock from which hiding place it was impossible to reach the game, or to smoke it out.

After experiencing the disappointment of losing his rabbit on several hunts in this way, Mr. Martin decided one morning to make one more try, and if the rabbit got away this time, he would quit hunting. He was thoroughly disgusted and thought something about buying enough dynamite to blast up that rock by the roots. He needed some rock on his plantation anyway.

Now on this particular day, Mr. Martin says, he had both of his dogs out and when they jumped the rabbit, one of the dogs suddenly quit running after the cotton-tail but sped back like the wind to the rock where he stopped and waited for the rabbit to arrive. Before the rabbit could get in the hole the dog nabbed him.

Mr. Martin says that after that he had no more trouble getting his meat. Just as soon as the race would start, this particular dog would rush back to the hole under the rock and wait, while the other dog kept the chase, and the dog at the hole caught the tail before it could get in. Mr. Martin says he would not pay $100 for that dog.

Dr. and Mrs. Walter S. Hunt and young son, Skellie, of Fort Monroe, Va., have been guests of the Hunt's parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Hall, for several days. They will visit Dr. Hunt's family at Thomasville before returning to Fort Monroe.

Over the business meeting. There were reports from various committees and a special report by sponsor a P. T. A. meeting March.
