INCIDENTS OF THE ROAD

On a beautiful North Carolina highway, the November landscape in its setting of crimson and gold and russet and drab, was glamorous in the sunlight.

A beautiful girl lay face downward on the pavement, trying to rise. She had come through the windshield and as she clutched at her throat trying to stop the gushing flood, trying to get a breath, patrolmen and others arrived and assisted her to a sitting posture which she was unable to hold. She was dead. A dark clotted stream trickled off the pavement to be absorbed in the earth.

At the foot of a slight embankment against the butt of a pine rested a crumpled mass of battered iron, once called a car. Still holding the steering wheel, looking like he was laughing, the driver sat with glaring, sightless eyes. The lower part of his body was clasped between irons hurled by the impact. He was also dead.

This was only an incident of the road, and is only one of a hundred other similar tragedies, many of them even more horrible, that occur on our beautiful North Carolina highways EVERY MONTH.

Go to the hospital and hear the piteous story of the maimed; go to the funeral parlors and raise the cloth from the mound on the slab.

But is there anything you can do about it?

THE PARK AND ITS GENIUS

Had a pleasant visit from our friend Bob Ormand the other night.

Mr. Ormand is the genius of that delightful area of the Saura Mountains known as Hanging Rock State Park.

If you have never visited this enchanting place, go up some time. Among North Carolina parks we are told the State authorities love Hanging Rock best.

Bob Ormand has done a remarkable work up there, with his limited resources. The handiwork in stone designed by him was done by CCC boys who, as soon as they become trained, usually leave as their terms are limited. Thus the teacher must constantly train new hands.

We have mentioned before the charming little house that looks like a medieval chateau at the foot of the great hill, and facing the lake.

Now the administrative building is slowing, and it will probably be even more attractive than the bath house.

Ormand has a soul for beauty and has blended with utility. The marks of his skill in creative art of architecture, demonstrated at Hanging Rock, must endure for ages.

Highly paid labor at government departments has depleted the ranks of the CCC, but Ormand is persistently attracting the boys, but Ormand persistently plods on. His fairy garden slowly and persistently grows and blossoms.
