who first wrote and published it-: tle more carefully it will be observed that during the first sixty years of the government, when the country was ungovernment, when the country was under democratic rule, the per capita expense was between $1 and $2. In 1870 however, th cost of running the government amounted to $4.25, while ever since that time it has been steadily increasing. How is the difference explained? Was the country less prosperous under democrate rule before the war than at the present time? Not by any means. The most prosperous era this country has ever known was and the period intervening between the administrations of Jefferson and Lincoln. Within that period its population was six times multiplied, while during the thirty years which have followed it has only been doubled once. Since 1860 the expense of the government has increased by the issuing of federal pensions and other obligations growing out of the late war, but aside from these items of expense it is also true that der democratic rule, the per capita ex-
