

Little Home Made Tales For Little Home Folks.

Jesse Kilpatrick's Calves.

But Jesse was too smart for the hornets, before they had time to get out he had stopped up their front doors with mud and had them all prisoners. He tore loose from the briars and when he got back to the cart with his great big hornets nest, his pa, who had heard Tom's bellowing and the boys shouts for help, had got there and helped Tom up. "Why boys, boys," he said, "this is no way to break oxen, you ought to tie their tails together so they can't run ahead of each other."

"Pa," said Jesse, "was you skeered?" "Skeered! I ain't been skeered so bad since I run Miss Ratha Dennis' fence." "You mean since she run you, don't you pa?" said Paul. "Look a here, if you boys are going to break these oxen, you attend to that and no more of your foolishness," said pa.

The boys got in the cart again and Tom and Buck went along better this time, only Tom's neck hurt him so he would keep throwing his head around and bellow and drop spit. Buck was mad and wouldn't say much. When they crossed the branch Buck wanted to lie down in the water, but Jesse pushed him and made him get up. "Boys," said Jesse, "these oxen are broke enough to do some work, let's haul some fodder back home out of pa's creek field." So they drove up to the fodder stack and gave Buck and Tom some fodder to eat while they loaded the cart.

"What you going to do with that hornet's nest Jesse," asked Ike. "Put it in the bottom of the cart, I'll carry it home to make gun wads out of. Them hornets are keeping up a mighty buzzing in there, but they will sting themselves to death after awhile." When the cart was loaded they started back home. The calf boys didn't like the rustling of the fodder, but when Tom would start to run, Buck would pull him back and when Buck tried to stop Tom would pull him forward, so in that way they got along right well. The boys were all walking now. Jesse had the rope to drive. All of a sudden Tom gave a snort and a bellow, and then Buck gave a snort and a bellow, and both lit out like they were crazy, just as hard as they could run. Then the whole cart burst out in a blaze of fire. The hornets had got so mad and hot they set the nest on fire, and the two that got away had stung Tom and Buck the first thing. Jesse had the rope and couldn't turn loose. Here they went, Tom and Buck, running and bellowing and foaming at the mouth, Jesse hollowing and yelling, "Somebody head us, somebody head us," the fire roaring and blazing, and Ike and Paul away behind making all the noise they could. Jesse got loose from the rope just before they got to the branch. Tom and Buck as soon as they saw the water gave a running jump and turned the cart over just at the branch. The water put the fire out, but Tom and Buck kept right on for home, they broke the ring and set the cart in the wheels they broke the yoke and left that at the gate, and when Mr. Kilpatrick looked, he saw two white oxen (they were covered with foam) pulling for dear life against each other, one trying to get to the cow lot on one side of the house, the other trying to get to the calf pasture on the other side. Their tails were tied together so neither one budged an inch.

"Pa it's Tom and Buck; if I live," said Emma, and I just know them boys are hurt."

"Don't cry daughter," said pa. "them boys'll turn up all right. And sure enough they did, only Jesse said he felt a little sore where he had stepped so far apart with his legs.

Tom and Buck made real good oxens, after a long time, but Jesse has never tried to haul fodder and hornets together any more.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:

Some months ago my face was badly broken out with a cutaneous eruption when I was unable to account for and did not know what it was. It attracted considerable attention, and almost every one who saw it pronounced it Barber's Itch, and as I shaved at the shop of James Smith the public at once believed that the said Itch was therein contracted.

Now in justice to James Smith I feel constrained to say that I had no Barber's Itch. Dr. Bagwell who treated the case assured me that it was not Barber's Itch, and as it yielded readily to treatment and was soon cured, I am convinced that the Doctor was right. I am informed that Barber's Itch is very difficult to cure, and lasts for a long time, in some cases several years, my case of eruption was cured in two weeks.

I therefore attach no blame to said Smith in the matter.
